The Senator from Kentucky had attributed the disappearance of silver specie to exportation, and he attributed it to the hoarding of it by the banks, and partly by individuals. Change was a thing that was never exported. The country must be reduced to the lowest ebb before it would suffer the inconvenience and loss of sending it abroad, because it must go as mere bullion, to be re-coined, in the countries to which it is sent. Every man of reason and reflection could see at once the true cause for this scarcity; and upon the soundest principles of philosophy, when one good cause presented itself, it was idle to search for another. He would not have troubled the Senate with these remarks, but for the immediate connection the subject had with his constituents and himself, and but for the false position laid down by the Senator from Kentucky.

That Senator seemed to have taken North Carolina under his especial charge, and to have felt himself called upon to take part in the public struggles within her. When he and his colleague, some time ago, introduced certain resolutions coming from their State, the Senator took the unusual course of appearing as the advocate of one of the political parties of that State, and, in a lengthened address, assigning his views as to the complexion of the document and the course of the North Carolina Senators on this floor. And what followed? Why, a garbled statement of the debate was immediately sent out, in one of the papers of this city, in advance of the true statement containing the answers of his colleague and himself; and no doubt the intended effect was produced before the contradiction could overtake the misrepresentation, which was published in every Whig paper in the State. What was the case now? These being North Carolina resolutions, the Senator from Kentucky, who seems to take such an interest in that State, rises in his place and assumes a position in relation to them which, if uncontradicted, will have an unfavorable effect on the public mind. We must (said Mr. S.) be more fortunate now than usual, if the contradiction accompanies the assertion.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he was unwilling to prolong this discussion, but he would assure the Senator from North Carolina that he had not the least inclination to interfere between him and his constituents. When the resolutions from the Legislature of North Carolina instructing her Senators were presented, he had offered some remarks because they adverted to matters of general interest; and if an incorrect report of them had gone forth to the world, no one could regret it more than he did. He would have been pleased had the discussion been published just as it occurred in the Senate, but he had no agency or control of the subject. So much for that matter. This morning the Senator presents resolutions on the subject of silver change, and I, having within a few days received communications from different sections of the country on the same subject, think proper to make a few remarks: was this interfering between the Senator and his constituents? He thought not. But the Senator seems to think that I am mistaken in the cause to which I attributed the scarcity of silver change, viz: the unequal valuation of the gold bill. But did not facts bear out the assertion? Look at the importation of specie since the passage of the gold bill. Is it not almost exclusively in gold? And why? Because of the appreciation of that metal and the depreciation of silver by that bill. This affords a greater profit on the importation of gold, and hence there is not a proportionate supply of silver—the metal which furnishes change. So, too, when exchange with foreign nations is against us, and it becomes profitable to export specie, it is found more advantageous to send silver than gold; and hence a cause of the scarcity of change in Philadelphia, New York, and other cities, which are more immediately subject to be drained of their specie by their contiguity to our commerce. He did not consider himself infallible on this subject, but in expressing his views or theories on the matter he did not think he was doing anything improper in an American citizen or a member of the Senate.

Mr. STRANGE was very unwilling to prolong this debate, but he had been drawn into it very unexpectedly and unwillingly. He had assumed a position, which he felt bound to maintain the truth and reason of. He said that the Senator from Kentucky was guilty of a petitio principii—that he had assumed a principle not founded on fact. This the Senator had denied; but in the course of his remarks, he had shown a better reason for the disappearance of silver change than he had given in the beginning; and if he was right, there was no reason for its exportation, but a very good reason for its importation.

The Senator could not escape from his position, for whatever relative difference there was between gold and silver, paper was still cheaper than either. He admitted that the number of one dollar notes was greatly reduced. But small bills, even as low as three dollars, were still in circulation to a great extent, and these, as long as they were permitted to circulate, had the tendency to exclude change from circulation, and cause it to be hoarded. The Senator said that the banks had no interest in hoarding specie. But this argument could not stand, for it was their interest to hold on to all the specie they could get, so as to circulate their own notes, and this was the true cause for the disappearance of change. It was, therefore, perfectly idle to search for any other cause, or to talk about the exportation of the smaller coin which never was resorted to. When the gold bill was passed it was not to elevate gold, but to bring it to its true value when compared with silver. It was contended that the gold coin was above par, and was, consequently, so valuable for exportation that it could not remain in the country. The bill was, therefore, passed to remedy that evil, and he had no doubt but it had effected that object.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he did not intend to enter into a discussion of the relative value of gold and silver coins, but to express the opinion that the object of the Legislature of North Carolina, and the object of the people of the southern Atlantic and southwestern States was to obtain a supply of silver change in place of the odious shinplasters which now infested the interior. With proper legislation, it was obvious that that object could be effected greatly to the interest of the people, without any expense to the Government. It was known to all acquainted with mining operations, that where gold was found there was a proportion of silver found with it. Now, under the existing laws, the branch mints were not allowed to coin silver change, though they had had a sufficiency of silver for that purpose, which, if coined, would not be exported, but go into the circulation of the country, in place of those filthy shimplasters which now usurped their place. That was the object of these resolutions; and it was out of place to go into any foreign causes for the scarcity complained of.

Mr. BENTON applauded the sound and practical views presented by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. LUMPKIN,] and considered what he said to be entirely conclusive on the point to which he directed his observations. He did not rise to add anything to those remarks, but to call the attention of the Senate to a report from the Secretary of the Treasury which had just been printed and laid on our tables, and which might not yet have been observed by members. It was a report which contained the precise information which this conversational debate required, and which would show how great was the error of supposing that gold coin had been overvalued in the United States by the act of 1834, and how far that act was from preventing an importation of silver, or causing it to be exported, or banishing silver change.

It would be recollected that the friends of hard money had passed two bills in 1834—a silver bill as well as a gold bill. The object of the latter was to correct the error of our gold standard; the object of the former was to repeal the law passed by the United States Bank party in 1819, to illegalize the circulation of all silver except Spanish milled dollars, of which, in consequence of the cessation of the Spanish dominion over Mexico and South America, there were no longer any coined. It was, therefore, an act to illegalize the circulation of the only silver which came to us.

At the time of the passage of these bills, the most lugubrious vaticinations were indulged in by the paper-money party. They were incessant and vehement in their declarations that the hard-money currency was ruined; that gold was debased; that it would supersede silver, prevent its importation, cause its exportation, and drive it out of the country; and that we should have no hard-money currency but a debased gold coinage. These were the declarations incontinently repeated at that time; and now, after upwards of four years' experience, how stands the fact? Sir, the fact stands thus: that so far from preventing the importation of silver, the actual importation of that coin has exceeded thirty-five million dollars since the passage of the gold bill; being the largest importation of that coin which has ever taken place since the establishment of the Federal Government. So much for importation.

Now for the exportation. And here it is seen that the export, instead of being confined to silver, was, at the only time that a commercial exportation took place, which was in the spring of 1837, when the banks suspended, far larger of gold, in proportion to the quantity of the two metals which was in the country, than it was of silver. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the export of gold was, during that year, $1,828,000, while the export of silver was only $2,756,000. Now, the quantity of silver in the country at that time was at least four times greater than that of gold; and therefore the export of silver should have been eight or nine millions to have been in proportion to the gold, while it was not, in fact, so much as one million more. Thus it is proved that our gold bill has neither prevented the importation of silver, nor caused its exportation. There is upwards of seventy millions of silver now in the country, besides the gold; and the only cause of its disappearance from circulation is in the deluge of small notes with which the paper-money party floods the land.

So much for silver; with respect to gold, the same report shows that we have imported about twenty-six millions, either in gold coin or bullion, since the passage of the gold bill; that there has been coined of the former gold of the United States about a million and a quarter; and of native bullion about two millions and a half; making an acquisition of that metal, in about four years, of $30,000,000, without counting what came in by emigrants and escaped registry at the custom-houses. The whole acquisition of gold and silver since 1832, when the United States Bank charter was vetoed, and when our hard-money policy first commenced, is at least eighty millions; which, added to $20,000,000 which was in the country at that time, makes at least one hundred millions now in the country.

Besides the view of our acquisition of gold and silver since the two hard-money bills of 1834, the same report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows us the state of the circulation of the Bank of the United States during the whole period of its existence; and this statement shows us that the quantity of gold now in the United States is near three times the average circulation of that bank, and near one third more than it ever was, at its most expanded period. The average circulation of that bank was only $11,000,000; its highest annual circulation was only $22,000,000, while our gold coin is now actually about thirty millions. This being the case, we ought to have a plentiful gold currency; we ought to have three times as much gold in circulation as we formerly had of United States Bank notes. But this is not the case, and why? Because the banks hoard the gold, and will not pay it out in redemption of their notes, and because the Government of the United States encourages and fosters that practice of the banks by dispensing with the use of gold, and using the notes of the banks in the collection and disbursement of its revenue. As long as this is the case—so long as the Federal Government uses bank paper—gold will remain locked up in the banks; and there will be no way to get it out of them but to make them overflow—to gorge them—to bring so much gold into the country that the banks cannot hoard the whole of it.

This is another proof that gold is not debased by our new law. If it was debased—if it was reduced below its relative value to silver—it would be always paid out in preference to silver, but it is not so paid out. On the contrary, it is hugged and hoarded by the banks; they will give silver for their notes, but they make apologies when you want gold.

There is still another proof on this head; it is to be found in every price current. Look to the relative value of American gold and silver in any one of these papers, and you will always find it to be about equal. Spanish milled dollars—those with a Spanish King's head, especially the pillar dollars, the column of Hercules dollars—they bear a premium, because they are wanted for exportation to the East, where their currency, for three centuries and a half, has made them the most acceptable foreign coin which can be carried to the Asiatic or African countries; but American gold coin and silver are even in the market. No, sir; gold does not expel silver, but small bank notes and shimplasters do expel it. A political party, and the banks in their interest, do all they can to banish both gold and silver; and it is the bounden duty of the Federal Government to cease to be accessory to another explosion of the banks by continuing to dispense with the use of coin, and continuing to use paper money. Another explosion is coming. It will come as certainly as the revolution of the seasons; and the Federal Government should foresee the event, and provide against it by going back to the act of 1789; and acting upon that act, and receiving nothing but gold and silver in payment of its revenues. This would check bank expansions, and protect the country as well as the Federal Treasury.

At ten and a half premium on foreign exchange, exportation of specie begins. The cotton dealing Bank of the United States can put it up to that point any day it pleases. It put it up in May of 1837; the exportation of specie immediately began; and over every parcel exported the paper-money party shouted, exulted, and triumphed, as if a great victory had been achieved. And so it will be again. The premium on foreign exchange is now upwards of nine per centum; it can be made ten and a half at any moment; then for exporting specie, triumphing again, more panics, shutting up banks, and charging the whole upon the Democratic Administration.

To return to the North Carolina resolution; it is a wise, just, and necessary measure which it requires. The branch mints should coin silver change; they will be able to supply it to districts of interior country, which cannot obtain supplies from New Orleans or Philadelphia. This Administration, and that of General Jackson, have begun to furnish a national supply of silver change. They have done much; but it is only the commencement of what ought to be done. The country does not yet feel the supply. Nine tenths of the Union has no silver change of our coinage. It will take years of close work at all our mints to give us the supply of this change which France and England has, say three dollars a head to each person of their whole population. It will take us several years to attain that point; and we need it more than the French and English do; for we have to guard against the shimplaster party; we have to guard against another deluge of shimplasters at the next suspension of the banks; we have to guard against this pestilence; and it is our business to provide such an ample supply of silver change that there can be no pretext for another issue of this pestiferous stuff.

Silver change is never exported; and this is another reason for an ample supply of it. Two or three dollars a head, for our whole population, ought to be coined in twenty-five cent, ten cent, and five cent pieces.

Mr. BROWN observed that he was not in his seat when his honorable colleague presented the resolutions, but he had heard a part of the debate which had grown out of them. He rose now for the purpose of declining to enter into the discussion on what he considered a mere abstract proposition. The Senate had given the best proof of its conviction of the value of silver circulation, by passing the bill which he introduced at the early part of the session, to authorize the branch mints to coin silver change. He had now nothing further to say than to express the hope that this bill would revive a favorable consideration in another quarter.

On motion of Mr. STRANGE, the resolutions were then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of Hannah Sanford; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YOUNG presented a memorial from a number of citizens of the northern portion of the State of Illinois, asking for the establishment of a new land office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a petition from a number of citizens residing on the northern frontiers of the United States, representing the great advantages that would result from having a steam revenue cutter on Lake Erie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of a number of citizens of Philadelphia, praying for an appropriation to create an artificial harbor at the mouth of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal; which was referred to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Job Whittall, of Philadelphia, asking for relief from Congress in consideration of the sufferings and services of his father during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Mira Alexander, daughter and heir-at-law of Colonel George Madison, deceased; which, after some remarks from Mr. C., was read and ordered to a second reading, and the report accompanying the bill was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported without amendment the joint resolution in favor of — Wright, of New York, and the bills for the relief of Nathan H. Boon and Samuel Dickerson.

Also, with amendment, the bill for the relief of John Wiley and Jefferson Greer.

Messrs. PRENTISS and FULTON also reported on House bills that had been referred to the same committee.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported without amendment the bill from the House making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported unfavorably on the bill from the House for the relief of Hulbert Taylor.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time, and passed:

A bill for the relief of the securities of Elias B. Langham, late surveyor general for the States of Missouri and Illinois;

A bill to authorize the issuing of a patent to the heirs and legal representatives of Francis Rivaud, deceased;

A bill for the relief of the assignees of Louis Baron de Ferrier;

A bill for the relief of Sebastian Butcher and the heirs and legal representatives of Bartholomew Butcher, Michael Butcher, and Peter Bloom;

A bill for the relief of Obed P. Lacy;

A bill to continue in force an act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved July 9, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved March 2, 1833;

A bill for the relief of Joseph Bogey;

A bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana;

A bill for the relief of Isabella Hill, widow, and John Hill, Elizabeth Hill, and Samuel Hill, children and minor heirs-at-law of Samuel Hill, deceased;

A bill for the relief of Charles Morgan, of Louisiana;

A bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain preëmption claims to land in Indiana;

A bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to amend an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians;"

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame de Lusser and their legal representatives;

A bill to confirm the title to a certain tract of land in the county of Mobile;

A bill for the relief of Juan Belgar;

A bill for the relief of General Matthew Arbuckle;

A bill to transfer to the citizens of the parish of Concordia, in the State of Louisiana, the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land;

A bill for the relief of Joseph Cochran;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Elihu Hall Bay;

A bill for the relief of the legal heirs and representatives of Wm. Conway;

A bill for the relief of Pierre Barthe;

A bill for the relief of Daniel Marsack; and

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Eslava.

HEIRS OF J. J. BULOW.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of the heirs of John J. Bulow, deceased; and after some remarks from Mr. H.

Mr. NILES moved to postpone the bill till the first Monday of December next.

A debate then ensued, in which Messrs. NILES, HUBBARD, STRANGE, MORRIS, BAYARD, BUCHANAN, PRESTON, and CRITTENDEN, participated; when, on taking the question, the motion to postpone was lost—yeas 19, nays 20.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, the debate was continued by Messrs. YOUNG, NILES, LUMPKIN, WHITE, KING, and NORVELL; after which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, yeas 19, nays 19—the President giving the casting vote in the affirmative.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 4, 1839.

Mr. PARKER asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Public Printing have leave to employ a clerk.

Objection being made,

Mr. P. moved a suspension of the rules, stating that there was a great mass of testimony to be taken, and the committee could not get on without this assistance.

The rules were suspended—90 to 42—and the resolution concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS asked the consent of the House to take up the resolution submitted by him on Monday last to change the time of the daily hour of meeting to eleven o'clock, a. m.

Objection being made,

Mr. D. moved a suspension of the rules, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on his demand, were taken, and were—yeas 114, nays 54.

So the rules were suspended, and the resolution being before the House,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said, apprehending there might be considerable discussion on this resolution, and seeing no necessity for it, he demanded the previous question; which was seconded—70 to 58—and the main question ordered—72 to 59—put, and carried.

So the resolution was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PENNYBACKER asked the indulgence of the House to present some petitions, stating that he had been kept away by very severe indisposition from attending in his place. The leave was granted unanimously, and Mr. P. presented the petitions; they were appropriately referred.

PAUPERS AND CONVICTS.

Mr. RUSSELL rose and said it would be in the recollection of the House, that last session the select committee on the subject had reported a bill to prevent the introduction of foreign paupers and convicts into the United States. Subsequent events have shown the importance of that bill, and the necessity of action upon it, and he, therefore, moved that the bill be made the special order for next Thursday week.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped no more special orders would be adopted, especially as they had several already.

Other objections were made.

Mr. RUSSELL moved a suspension of the rules, but the motion was rejected.

RESOLUTIONS OF VERMONT.

This being petition day, the SPEAKER announced, as the first business in order, the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, presented two weeks ago by Mr. EVERETT, on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the slave trade, &c., which Mr. E. had moved to have read, printed, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER had decided that these resolutions fell within the operation of Mr. Atherton's resolution of the 12th of December, and that they must go on the table, in the words of that order, without being read, printed, debated, or referred.

Mr. EVERETT took an appeal from that decision; and

Mr. BRONSON had demanded the previous question thereon; but

Mr. PARRIS had moved to lay the appeal on the table; and this was the motion now pending.

Mr. PARRIS now withdrew his motion, as did Mr. BRONSON his demand for the previous question; and, therefore, the question recurred on the appeal.

Mr. EVERETT briefly drew the attention of the Chair to that branch of the resolutions protesting against the resolution of the 12th of December, and insisted that, by no implication, could that portion of the former be said to have anything to do with slavery.

The SPEAKER said he had not decided that that branch of the resolution, taken by itself, fell within the operation of that order of the House; but there were other portions of them relating to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the admission of new States without the recognition of slavery, and the suppression of the slave trade between the States, which clearly fell within that order.

Mr. EVERETT made some further remarks on the point; when

The SPEAKER stated the grounds of his decision substantially as follows: certain joint resolutions were presented from the Legislature of Vermont, embracing, among other things, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the slave trade between the States, and the admission of new States into the Union. The Chair decided that these portions of the memorial or resolutions, under the order of the House of the 12th of December last, would lie on the table. Any other portion of the resolutions which merely went to protest against that order, would not fall within the operation of it. Upon presenting these resolutions, the gentleman from Vermont moved that they be read, printed, and referred to a committee—

Mr. EVERETT. To a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It is the same thing. The Chair then reiterated several former decisions of the House, identical with the one then under consideration. In the first session of the Twenty-Fourth Congress, while the select committee raised under the resolution of Mr. Pinckney, on the subject of slavery, was in existence, a gentleman from Virginia, not now a member of this House, (Mr. Patton,) presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of that State on the subject of abolition, and moved their reference to that committee, with certain instructions. There was an existing order then in force for the reference of all papers on this subject to that select committee under similar prohibitions against being read, debated, &c., and under the general phraseology of that order, the present Speaker decided that resolutions of State Legislatures fell within its order. From that decision Mr. Patton took an appeal, and upon a solemn vote of the House the decision was sustained by a vote of 143 to 40. Upon the point as to reading such resolutions, the same question was decided at the same time, and again at the subsequent sessions, viz: that, under the then existing orders, they could not be read. At the same session of that Congress a memorial on the subject of abolition, &c., was presented by the same gentleman from Vermont, who asked for its reading. The Speaker decided it must go to the select committee without reading, and the House acquiesced in that decision. At the second session of that Congress, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] after the adoption of an order similar to the one now in force, presented a memorial on the subject of abolition, and called for its reading. The Speaker decided that it must go on the table without being read, printed, or referred, reciting the words of the order. An appeal was taken from this decision, and the appeal was laid on the table. On the same occasion, Mr. Adams presented upwards of twenty other similar petitions, and asked the reading of each. The Speaker made the same decision in each case, the gentleman appealed in every one of them, and the appeals were severally laid on the table by a vote of the House. These questions had been repeatedly settled by the House.

Mr. BRONSON had inteded at first (he said) to demand the previous question, but he now moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which, being ordered, were—yeas 122, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Clowney, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crockett, Cushman, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Duun, Edwards, Ewing, Farrington, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hawes, Hawkins, Herod, Holsey, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Loomis, Mallory, Martin, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Menefee, Mercer, Miller, Mitchell, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Noble, Palmer, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Plumer, Pope, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Reilly, Richardson, Rives, Robertson, Rumsey, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Southgate, Spencer, Stanley, Stuart, Stone, Swearingen, Tallaferro, Taylor, Thompson, Titus, Toucy, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesley, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, Worthington, and Yell—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, Ayer, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Clark, Cranston, Darlington, Davies, Drongoolle, Evans, Everett, Isaac Fletcher, Richard Fletcher, Giddings, Goode, Grenell, Halsted, Hastings, Henry, Lincoln, Sampson Mason, McKennan, Matthias Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogile, Peck, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Tillinghast, and Toland—44.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to refer that portion of the resolutions relating only to the resolution of the 12th of December to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay it on the table; which was agreed to without a division.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Petitions and memorials were then called for, and were presented by Messrs. SLADE, FLETCHER, and ALLAN, of Vermont.

[Mr. ALLAN presented the petition of one hundred and seventeen citizens of St. Albans, in Vermont, for the recognition of the Republic of Hayti. Also, the petition of one hundred and twenty-one citizens of St. Albans, in Vermont, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and Territory of Florida, and to prohibit the traffic in slaves between the States. Also, the petition of one hundred and twenty citizens of St. Albans, in Vermont, against the admission of any new State into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery, and against the annexation of Texas.]

Messrs. MARVIN, RUSSELL, BICKNELL, BEERS, GALLUP, NOBLE, VANDERVEER, SPENCER, KEMBLE, GRANT, CAMBRELENG, MCLELLAN, PRATT, BRONSON, TAYLOR, CLARKE, EDWARDS, MITCHELL, CHILDS, PECK, PUTNAM, MOORE, BIRDSALL, LOOMIS, DE GRAFF, HOFFMAN, and SIBLEY, of New York.

[Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of forty-three Whigs, three Democrats, and nineteen women, of the town of Bombay, in the State of New York, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; also, against the admission of Texas. Also, the same persons' petition for the recognition of Hayti. Also, the petition of A. C. Brown, and about one hundred others, citizens of the fourteenth congressional district in the State of New York, on the subject of our neutral relations with Great Britain.

Mr. MCLELLAN presented the petition of citizens of Troy, New York, praying an alteration in the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GALLUP presented the memorial of John Preston, an octogenarian and soldier of the Revolution, aged eighty-three years and eighty-eight days, proposing certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, embracing a plan for a uniform system of banking throughout the United States; which plan suggests that Congress shall determine what sum, in dollars, shall be necessary to carry on the commercial affairs of the United States, (say $250,000,000,) and that such sum, when so determined upon, shall be divided among the several States and the District of Columbia, in proportion to the inhabitants of each. The District of Columbia to have one bank, and the Legislatures of the several States to determine into how many branches their respective quotas shall be divided. That, before any bank so established shall enter upon the business of banking, the whole amount of the capital stock of such bank shall be paid in, in gold and silver. That no bank shall issue, or keep in circulation, more than two dollars in paper for one dollar in specie actually in their vaults; and that no one person shall be permitted to hold or own more than fifty shares of $100 each, and that, for the further security of the billholders, each stockholder shall mortgage to the treasurer of the State where the bank shall be located, unincumbered real estate in value to twice the amount of the stock held by such stockholder. Also, the petition of Jonathan Jenkins, A. C. Disbrow, David J. D. Verplanck, and others, of the county of Albany, praying Congress to pass a law giving to all revolutionary pensioners ninety-six dollars per year, without reference to the time served; which, with others upon the same subject presented to the House at its last session, and withdrawn from the files for that purpose, were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. BRONSON presented the petition of forty-two men and forty-seven women of Smithville, Jefferson county, New York, praying Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia and in the Territories where it exists, and to exercise the constitutional power so as to prohibit the domestic slave trade. Also, another petition from the same persons, praying Congress not to admit any new State into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery, and to reject all overtures for the admission of Texas into the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the petitions of Hiram Judson and one hundred and forty-two others; of C. N. Westcott and thirty others; and of Abram Phillips and thirty-three others, inhabitants of the county of Onondaga, New York, praying for a repeal or modification of the neutrality law of the last session of Congress. Also, the petition of Joel G. Dawson and others, for a mail route from Kirkville, Onondaga county, New York, to Bridgeport, Madison county. Also, petitions from inhabitants of the town of Lafayette, New York, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the recognition of the independence of Hayti.

Mr. PRATT presented the petitions of John W. Wyckoff, Ranson Johnson, L. A. Hubbard, J. Green, Ashael Whitcomb, John Groat, and Lohan R. Robinson; which were severally referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. DE GRAFF presented the memorial of the representatives of Elbert Anderson; of Mary W. Thompson, widow and devisee of the late Colonel Alexander R. Thompson; of a farmer, from Gouverneur, in favor of a national bank; of Samuel Belding and others, praying to be released as sureties for the late Melancton W. Bostwick, a purser in the Navy, who was lost on board the ship-of-war Epervier, foundered at sea.

Mr. NOBLE presented the memorial of about eight hundred citizens of the county of Cayuga, New York, praying the repeal or modification of the neutrality law of the last session of Congress; and, also, that some action may be had by Congress in relation to the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, at Schlosser.]

Messrs. STRATTON, AYCRIGG, RANDOLPH, HALSTED, and YORKE, of New Jersey.

Messrs. SERGEANT, POTTS, NAYLOR, McKENNAN, KEIM, PLUMER, HENRY, SHEFFER, BEATTY, M. MORRIS, BUCHANAN, TOLAND, and PETRIKIN, of Pennsylvania.

Also, the petition of Joel Wierman and fifty-three others, citizens of the same county and State, praying for the immediate abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the said District. Also, the petition of Phebe Wright and sixty other women of the aforesaid county, praying for the like object; which several petitions, under the order of the House, were severally laid on the table.

Mr. HENRY presented the petition of one hundred and twenty-seven inhabitants of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and Territories, and also the slave trade. Also, the petition of a number of citizens of South Beaver township, Beaver county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and the slave trade, and against the admission of any new State into the Union the constitution of which tolerates slavery. Also, the remonstrance of a number of citizens of Chippewa township, Beaver county, Pennsylvania, against the admission of any new State into the Union the constitution of which tolerates slavery, and to reject all applications for the annexation of Texas into the Union. Also, the petition of a number of citizens of the same place, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and Territory of Florida. Also, the petition of a number of the citizens of Beaver and Butler counties, praying Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. Also, the petition of a number of citizens of Beaver and Butler counties, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and all the Territories. Also, the remonstrance of a number of citizens of Beaver and Butler counties, against the admission of any new State into the Union that tolerates slavery.

Mr. MORRIS presented fifteen petitions with five hundred and fifty-one signatures, three hundred and sixty-seven of women and one hundred and eighty-four of men, of Bucks county, Pennsylvania, five of which petitions were against the annexation of Texas to the United States; four against the inter-State slave trade; five for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia and the Territories; and one praying that the resolution "abridging the invaluable right of petition" may be immediately rescinded; one of which petitions also prays that the petition may be referred to a select committee, and that the undersigned may be heard in person or by counsel; all of which were laid upon the table.

Mr. BICKNELL presented the petition of Gerrit Smith and eighty-five males, Ann C. Smith and eighty-six females, of the town of Smithfield, and county of Madison, State of New York, praying that Congress may act as mediator between France and Mexico, and for other purposes; which was, on his motion, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HAMMOND presented the petition of Major J. Plympton, and other officers of the line of the Army, asking to be placed on an equal footing with the several staff corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PETRIKIN presented the petition of Eve Haas, widow of a revolutionary soldier, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. PLUMER presented the petition of Sarah Atkinson and others, praying that the executors of Thomas Atkinson, deceased, be discharged from the payment of a judgment in favor of the United States, against the executors of Thomas Atkinson and others, sureties of Richard Bean, collector of the internal revenue; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Also, the petition of Debora Bowen, mother of Benjamin Hillman, who died in the service of his country during the late war, praying for a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. Also, the petition of James Coe, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Also, the petition of the Hon. C. Rowe, asking compensation for services rendered, and money loaned, the United States Government by his father, a soldier of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.]

Messrs. JENIFER, JOHNSON, and HOWARD, of Maryland.

Messrs. BOULDIN, COLES, MORGAN, TALIAFERRO, and MERCER, of Virginia.

Messrs. BYNUM, MONTGOMERY, DEBERRY, and STANLY, of North Carolina.

[Mr. MONTGOMERY presented certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of his State, relating to the distribution of the public lands or their proceeds among the States. Mr. M. said he had intended to have accompanied these resolutions with some remarks, but would postpone them for a few days, when the subject would be before the House in a form that would not only afford him an opportunity of giving his views relative to the public lands, but would require it of him, as a Representative in the discharge of a solemn duty, not only to the State he had the honor in part to represent, but also to his immediate constituents, in defense of their private rights. He referred to the Senate bill which had passed that body, and was pending before the House, ceding all the public lands in the State of Tennessee to the said State, which lands, by the cession act of North Carolina, were set apart and secured as a fund to pay and satisfy the old North Carolina revolutionary soldiers' claims. He would, therefore, for the present, only offer a hearty response to the resolutions, and hand them to the Chair, and ask that they be laid upon the table, and be printed.]

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina.

Mr. CLEVELAND, of Georgia, presented the petition of the representatives of Captain John Jackson, late of the revenue service of the United States, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the petition of Almon Baldwin and three hundred and fifty citizens of the States bordering on the Ohio river, praying Congress to take measures for the construction of an additional canal around the falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana side of the river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.]

Mr. WORD, of Mississippi.

Mr. CASEY, of Illinois, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their best exertions to procure an appropriation sufficient to put all the unsurveyed lands in the State of Illinois under immediate contract, and that they urge on the Commissioner of the General Land Office the necessity of prompt attention to this subject, in order that the numerous settlers thereon may be enabled to purchase the land on which they reside. Also, resolutions of said Legislature, instructing their delegation in Congress to procure at the present session of Congress, the passage of a law by that body establishing a permanent system of preemption rights, by which the actual settler upon lands of the Government of the United States shall have the exclusive privilege of purchasing at Congress price any quarter section of land upon which he may have made an improvement. Also, that they use their exertions to procure the passage of a law providing that the public lands hereafter be sold in limited quantity to actual settlers only, and that a reasonable time be allowed such settlers to pay for the same; which, on his motion, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. Mr. C. also presented sundry other petitions, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

Messrs. LYON and CRABB, of Alabama.

Messrs. HARRISON and MILLER, of Missouri.

[Mr. HARRISON presented the petitions of Martin Thomas, praying the allowance of a claim against the Government, ascertained and allowed by a jury; of Richard B. Brumfield, praying that he may be allowed the five years' half pay allowed the widow and children of those killed in battle; of Joseph Barclay, asking an appropriation of money and land due him for his services as a soldier in the late war with Great Britain; of Noah Coil, that he may be allowed to make a change of his entry of land; of Pierre A. Also, the petition of inhabitants of Wisconsin, praying an appropriation for a harbor at Milwaukee.

Mr. CHAPMAN, of Iowa.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Connecticut.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether any, and if any, what kind of funds have been furnished William E. Woodruff, pension agent for the State of Arkansas, for the payment of pensions since the suspension of specie payments by the banks in May, 1837; and that the Commissioner of Pensions be directed to furnish this House with copies of the correspondence between himself and said Woodruff in the years 1837 and 1838, upon the subject of the funds furnished the latter for the payment of pensions.

Mr. STANLY, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House what amount of gold and silver has been coined at the branch mint in Charlotte, North Carolina, since it has been in operation, specifying how much has been coined each year, and also what has been the annual expense of the branch mint; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be also requested to inform this House what amount will be, as near as can be estimated, necessary for additional expense of machinery, or of persons to be employed, if a law shall be passed directing the coining of small change at the branch mint in North Carolina, as desired by the Legislature of North Carolina.

Mr. DOWNING, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for repairing the following military roads in Florida: From Jacksonville, by Nassau Court House, to Waterman's Bluff, on St. Mary's river; from Jacksonville, by Black Creek, to Newville.

Mr. CHAPMAN, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the drawing accompanying the report of the survey of the boundary line between the State of Missouri and the Territory of Iowa, be printed under the direction of the Topographical Bureau.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill for taking the next census of the United States.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House adjourned till eleven o'clock.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 5, 1839.

A number of bills from the House of Representatives were read twice, and referred to the appropriate committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a general return of the militia of the United States.

Mr. WALL presented the credentials of Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHWELL, elected by the Legislature of New Jersey a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. PIERCE presented the memorial of Colonel Many and others, officers of the line of the Army, stationed at Fort Jesup.

Mr. P. said, before taking the question on the reference, he desired to ask for this memorial the early consideration of the committee to which it would be appropriately referred, and, for a few minutes, the attention of the Senate at this time.

The memorial referred to a subject which was discussed to some extent here at the last session, and on which he believed there was, at that time, hardly a difference of opinion, namely, the relative pay of the officers of the line of the Army and the staff. The Army bill of the last session, so called, did not attract the attention of Senators generally until a very late period of its progress; and you will remember, sir, under what circumstances the little discussion which it had here took place; it was at a stage when it could not be amended; it must be taken as a whole, as it was presented, or be lost.

He thought he was warranted in saying that it owed its passage to these circumstances: the unquiet state along the whole line of your frontier—eastern, northern, and southern—the supposed hostile disposition of the Indians west of the Mississippi—and the fact that it included among its provisions one for the increase of the admitted incompetent and insufficient force of the rank and file of the army of four thousand five hundred men. Some of the provisions of that bill, it is notorious, found no favor in this Senate; but, strong as were the objections to the bill, some of which he attempted at that time to state, he had no disposition to notice now any except the one particularly alluded to in the memorial. It was known to the Senate, but it might not be generally known that a colonel in the staff, stationed permanently in this city, received twenty-five dollars per month more than an officer of the same grade, exposed, not only to all the dangers and hardships of the field, but to the extra expenses incident to frequent changes of station and service. The same disparity was true of the lieutenant colonels, and still more with regard to captains. The young officers who have been promoted to this rank in the staff receive thirty-five dollars per month, $420 per year, more than the veterans in the line; one of whom, at least, up to the last session of Congress, had served, and with the highest credit as an officer, since 1808, said at that time to be the oldest captain in the world. How this might be he knew not, but there were a multitude of old and meritorious officers in that grade, officers who had done sufficient service to warrant them in protesting against this unjust distinction in favor of those who were in their childhood when they were fighting the battles of their country, during the late war with Great Britain.

His main object in saying a word on the presentation of the memorial, was to place it in a true light, and to call the attention of the Senate to its honorable tone and spirit. The officers of the line of the Army were not here begging for an increase of pay; they preferred no claim, but respectfully asked what was respectively and substantially right. He could not so perfectly do justice to them, as by reading from their memorial. After setting forth the operation of the bill of the last session, the memorialists say:

"Now we hope your honorable bodies will understand distinctly, that it is not the amount of compensation conferred to which we advert, but it is the distinction which this act makes in favor of those particular departments of service; and which, as it degrades us in the scale of military worthiness, we pray your honorable bodies to remove."

It is the distinction, the invidious and unjust distinction, of which the officers of the line complain, not the amount of compensation. No, sir, although they have stood on the same footing in relation to pay since 1791, (rations only excepted,) while you have increased the pay of the Navy, of the clerks in your different bureaus, of the staff, and indeed, I believe, of all your officers, with this single exception, they would probably have remained silent but for this cause, which, in my judgment, makes it their duty to address you.

One or two other paragraphs from their memorial:

"The operation of the act of the 5th of July last, has been to give the officers of the staff corps a very remarkable and unequal rate of promotion and compensation, when compared with that of the officers of the line."

"If there were good reasons, growing out of their particular duties or stations, for the marked difference in their favor, we should rejoice that the liberality of the Government had been extended to them; but the facts on those points are directly in opposition to the bounty which has been bestowed."

They say a very remarkable and unequal rate of promotion, as well as compensation, has been bestowed upon the staff. The probable tardiness of promotion in the staff corps has sometimes been urged as a reason for additional pay—singularly urged. The statement of the memorial is correct. The officers in the staff department have, by the very operation of the bill of the last session, obtained more promotion than they would probably have obtained in the line of the Army if they had remained there till they were sixty years old. Am I not correct? Let me give an illustration. There was an officer promoted in the staff, by the operation of the bill of last session, who is now a full colonel, with the rank of brigadier general, who was a lieutenant in 1818. A meritorious and worthy officer, he believed; but where would he have found his rank in the line of the Army had he remained there? Certainly not higher than the grade of captain.

So far as he was capable of judging, every statement and deduction in this memorial was literally correct. The complaints were just, and deserve our consideration. If you will not level up, level down. There can be no doubt that the distinction, if any be made, should be in favor of the officers of the line; but all they ask is equality, and this is demanded alike by every consideration of justice and policy.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented petitions, numerous signed by citizens of Steuben and De Kalb counties, Indiana, and of Branch and Hillsdale counties, Michigan, on the subject of post roads.

Mr. S. said, previous to making any disposition of the petitions, he desired to ask the chairman of the committee whether it was the intention of the committee to act on the subject at the present session?

Mr. ROBINSON said it was not. The Department was not in a condition to make any new routes at the present session.

Mr. SMITH said he would ask to lay the petitions and plats upon the table, to be referred and acted upon at the next session; which was ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Mary E. Shaw and executors of John E. Shaw; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation in favor of their passage:

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Polly Lining, executrix of Charles Lining, deceased, who was executor of Edward Blake, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Daniel Ward and George Ficklin, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of a number of merchants of the city of New York, to make the Government liable for costs of suit to the same extent as individuals, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to authorize the Washington County Turnpike Company of Missouri, to construct a road over the public lands; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. STRANGE, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port in the jurisdiction of the United States; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Alvarez Fisk, and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge; and

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Bulow, were read a third time and passed.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

On motion of Mr. BENTON the bill for the armed occupation and settlement of Florida was taken up and discussed by Messrs. BENTON, PRESTON, and LINN.

After an executive session, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 5, 1839.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. EVERETT, ADAMS, and the CHAIR, relative to certain entries on the Journal of yesterday, after which,

Mr. ADAMS moved to correct the entry relative to the petition presented yesterday, by Mr. MOORE, from citizens of the District of Columbia, praying Congress to give no countenance or support to the Abolitionists. The Journal set forth that Mr. MOORE made a brief statement of the contents of the petition, and that then it was laid on the table. Mr. A. moved to amend this entry thus:

"While Mr. MOORE was making a brief statement of the contents of said petition, he was called to order by the Speaker, who decided that he was not in order; and the petition was sent to the Clerk's table, no order of the House being taken thereon."

Mr. A. asked for the yeas and nays on his motion; but they were refused.

Mr. DROMGOOLE suggested to the gentleman so to modify his motion as to make it appear that Mr. MOORE was called to order for departing from the rules, whereas his amendment would imply that the gentleman from New York had been called to order for complying with the rules.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had called the gentleman to order on the very ground that, instead of making a brief statement, he was addressing an argument to the House.

Mr. ADAMS would consent to any modification, so that the main fact was preserved, viz: that Mr. MOORE was called to order while making a brief statement.

Mr. TOUCEY moved to amend Mr. ADAMS's motion by stating the fact that Mr. MOORE was called to order for entering into the discussion of the merits of the petition, instead of confining himself to a brief statement thereof.

Mr. CRAIG believed the present entry on the Journal to represent the facts as correctly as they could be; and in order to test the sense of the House, he moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and the motion of Mr. A. was laid on the table without a division.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

Mr. HAYNES made an ineffectual motion to induce the House to go into committee again on the President's annual message.

Mr. INGHAM then obtained the floor, and called the attention of the House to the fact, that about three weeks ago a number of bills relating to the Navy were reported from the Committee of the Whole, and now had their place on the Speaker's table, where they were likely to remain; for he despaired of reaching them in the regular order of business, and he therefore moved that they be now taken up; but the motion was disagreed to.

The unfinished business of the morning was then resumed, being the motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG to amend a statement appended to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the state of the finances.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. BIDDLE to recommit the report, with instructions to correct any other errors in the report.

Mr. BRIGGS concluded his remarks in reply to Mr. RHETT, and in defense of former appropriations for works of internal improvement, a protective tariff, &c.

Mr. MARVIN then moved to amend the instructions by adding further instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means, to report the usual bills, according to the estimates which have been furnished in the President's message and accompanying documents.

Mr. M. then entered into a review of the report generally, condemning especially that part of it which related to the improvement of harbors and rivers, and defended the scheme of carrying on works of internal improvement by the Federal Government. He avowed himself ready to meet that question, both on the ground of expediency and constitutionality, but his remarks were mainly directed in defense of the appropriations for harbors and light-houses on the northern lakes. Before he concluded, the orders of the day were called for, to which the House proceeded.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th ultimo, giving a statement of the number of Indians annually removed from the eastern to the western side of the Mississippi.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in obedience to an act of Congress of the 2d March, 1833, inclosing abstracts of the general returns of the militia of the United States, and of their arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, for the year 1838.

Also, a communication from the Postmaster General, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 28th ultimo, inclosing a statement of the number of failures in the ordinary and express mails, distinguishing between the said mail to and from the city of New Orleans, within the last six months, the causes of the said failures, and the steps adopted by him to prevent the recurrence of such failures.

Also, a communication from the Postmaster General, in reply to a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 8th July, 1838, giving information as to what number of additional clerks was employed by that Department to answer the various calls for information at that session.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th ultimo, giving information as to certain charges alleged to have been preferred by Samuel Etheridge against Captain J. D. Elliott; which communications were severally ordered to lie on the table, and be printed; except the second, which was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

A large number of bills from the Senate, on the Speaker's table, were then taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army of the United States, for the year 1839.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, to increase the clause for national armories from $300,000 to $360,000.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, was entitled to the floor, but he yielded it to

Mr. THOMPSON, who addressed the House in a general attack upon the last and present Administrations.

The amendment of Mr. MASON was then rejected—ayes thirty-seven, noes not counted.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the bill by adding the following items:

For surveying and opening the western frontier military road, being the balance of an appropriation carried to the surplus fund, $53,125 67.

For completing the barracks at Savannah, Georgia, being the amount expended out of the general appropriation for the quartermaster's department, and to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to close the accounts, $18,588 83.

For completing the barracks at Fort Severn, Maryland, being the amount expended out of the general appropriation of the quartermaster's department, and to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to close the accounts, $9,029 53.

After some inquiries of Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, as to the necessity of the reappropriation, and replies and explanations by Mr. CAMBRELENG, the amendments were rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved the following amendment; which was not agreed to:

For completing Fort Livingston, at Grande Terre, in the State of Louisiana, $20,000.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend the bill by inserting:

For surveys of a civil and military character connected with the defense of the Atlantic and western frontiers, and the improvement of harbors, roads, and rivers, $500,000.

After some conversation between Messrs. CAMBRELENG and MERCER, as to the propriety of the amendment, the question was taken; and it was rejected.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, offered the following amendment:

For improvement of the buildings and machinery of the musket armory at Harper's Ferry, $35,400.

For improvement of the buildings and machinery of the rifle works at Harper's Ferry, $14,600.

Mr. PETRIKIN raised a question of order; but the amendment was declared by the Chair to be in order.

Mr. PICKENS remonstrated against considering estimates from the Department as having any authoritative influence to induce the House to grant appropriations.

Mr. MASON disclaimed having quoted them with any such view; and went on to state the need there was, from the existing state of the establishment at Harper's Ferry, for the adoption of such an amendment.

Mr. MONTGOMERY opposed the amendment, because it had not been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained why the proposed appropriation had not been included in the bill.

The question being put, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERCER moved to insert an item of $30,000 for the prosecution of surveys; but it was rejected without a division.

Mr. MONTGOMERY then submitted the following, to come in as additional sections of the bill:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no commissioned officer belonging to the Army of the United States, or attached to the Army in any manner whatever, under pay, shall receive any pay or rations for his services as such, except while he is at his post or command, except when prevented from attending by sickness; and, before receiving his pay, he shall furnish the paymaster, or such other person as may be legally authorized to pay him, with a true statement of the date when he joined his command or took his station, and the time he continued regularly at it, and the time, if any, he was prevented from attending to his regular duties on account of sickness; and he shall and may, upon such statement, receive such full pay per month or year as now is, or may hereafter be, allowed by law, and no more.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That so much of an act passed at the second session of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, entitled "An act to increase the military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes," as increases the number of commissioned officers of the Army, and so much of said act as increases the pay of any officer attached to the Army, and so much of said act as increases the non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates, and all and every part of said act that increases the expenses of our military establishment be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That, on the request of any Governor of a State or Territory, who may call on the Executive of the United States for such military force as he may deem proper and actually necessary to protect the lives or property of the citizens of his State or Territory, the President may accept of such number of volunteer troops, from said State or Territory, to be raised, officered, and organized under the laws of such State or Territory, for any time not exceeding twelve months, as he may deem sufficient to protect the lives and property of the citizens of such State or Territory, and maintain and defend the national honor and character; and should there not be a sufficient number of such volunteers in such State or Territory, then such volunteers from such other States or Territory as may offer their services, may be accepted upon the same terms and conditions; and in no case whatever shall such volunteers ever be placed under the command of any officer of the regular Army of the United States without their own consent, and that consent subject to be revoked by them at any and all times. Such volunteers to be entitled, while in service, to such pay and emoluments as the troops of the regular army now are or may be entitled to receive.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all such volunteers, soldiers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, shall receive and send all their own letters on their own private business free of postage.

Mr. CAMBRELENG insisted that the amendment was not in order, being not a modification of an existing law, but an entirely new law.

The CHAIRMAN acquiesced in this opinion, and ruled the amendment out of order.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House.

The amendments being concurred in,

Mr. CAMBRELENG renewed the first of his amendments, offered by him in committee; which was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER also renewed his amendment; pending which,

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 6, 1839.

Mr. LINN presented several memorials of individuals, for confirmation of lots in the town of Prairie du Chien; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MORRIS presented a memorial, numerous signed by citizens residing on the northern and western frontier of the United States, suggesting the propriety of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to construct a steam revenue cutter for service on the lakes; which he asked might be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING remarked that the Secretary of the Treasury had already the power, if he deemed it proper to exercise it, to construct a steamboat for the collection of the revenue; but inasmuch as it would involve some additional expense, it might be desirable for Congress to express an opinion as to the propriety of the measure, and this he would endeavor to obtain at some not very remote period.

The petition was then referred.

Mr. PRENTISS presented memorials for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia and between the States, &c.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the motion of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. KING presented a memorial, signed by numerous citizens of Florida, enumerating many advantages which would result from a connection between the Tennessee river and Mobile bay by railroad; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the following bills, severally, with an amendment:

An act for the relief of William Marcus; and

An act for the relief of John Dougherty.

Mr. F. also, from the same committee, reported the following bills, severally, without amendment:

An act for the relief of Enoch Matson;

An act for the relief of the heirs and assignees of Peter Alba, deceased; and

An act for the relief of Solomon Sturgess, assignee of Rezin Frazier.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which the same had been referred, reported the following bills without amendment:

The bill for the relief of Paul Poissot; and

The bill for the relief of J. Eloi Rachal.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Lefevre; which was agreed to.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of the widow of Thomas Crooks and the heir of John Goggin; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of John S. Wilson; which was read twice.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Charles G. Gunter, reported a bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation in the State of Alabama; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Ezekiel Jones, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the memorial of the Friendship Fire Company of Alexandria, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. R. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of the directors of the Georgetown College, reported a bill to incorporate the Georgetown College, in the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the papers in relation to the claim of John McCartney were taken from the files of the last session, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the petition and papers of Mrs. Mary W. Thompson, widow of Colonel Alexander Thompson, were permitted to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

SLAVERY QUESTION.

Mr. MORRIS submitted a resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into certain matters pertaining to the institution of slavery in the States and Territories, and to report thereon to the Senate; which he moved should be laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD said he hoped that the Senate would not, at this late period of the session, be called upon to act upon the resolution just presented by the Senator from Ohio. This subject has been before repeatedly brought to the notice of both Houses of Congress. He was entirely opposed to the consideration of this resolution at this time. He could not believe that the Senate would undertake to discuss this agitating question at this period of its session. He had, ever since he had been a member of the Senate, opposed all action upon the subject of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. He had repeatedly expressed his views upon this matter, and he had invariably urged it upon the Senate that it was a matter of policy, if not of duty, to let this whole subject alone. At the other end of this Capitol, his friend, one of the Representatives from the State he had the honor in part to represent, felt it to be his duty to offer sundry resolutions in relation to the subject of slavery. These resolutions have been fully discussed through the public press; and notwithstanding their author has received the most unmeasured abuse from particular public journals, yet he was free to say that he (Mr. H.) most sincerely concurred with his friend in every sentiment expressed by him in those resolutions; and he might add that a great majority of the constituents of his friend, he had reason to believe, were prepared fully to sustain him in the course he had pursued upon this subject. With these opinions he could not consent to consider the subject at this time. He was now, as he had heretofore been, wholly opposed to the consideration of this matter. He would not, unsolicited by those whose interests are to be affected by this proceeding, act in any way upon the subject embraced in the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, inquired if it would not be in order to move that the resolution should not be received.

The PRESIDENT stated that the rule of the Senate, directing that resolutions submitted by members of that body should be received, was positive, and did not admit of any question. Senators who objected to the resolution would have an opportunity to-morrow, when it came up for consideration, to move for its rejection; that it might be laid on the table, or for its indefinite postponement.

Mr. FOSTER expressed his surprise that the Senate had not the power by an instantaneous vote to refuse to receive the motion.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that in analogous cases leave was asked and granted before propositions could be submitted to the Senate, and instanced the case of a Senator who wished to introduce a bill. In that case leave was asked, and the question propounded was, should leave be granted, and the power of granting leave implies the power of refusing it. This principle, he thought, was also applicable to the reception of resolutions, and that the Senate had power to reject any proposition they thought proper. It is possible to conceive a case where a proposition might be submitted which was abusive or libelous of the Senate itself. Would they have no power in such a case to reject it? He merely put this to illustrate his position, that the Senate was not bound to entertain every proposition submitted to it. As the question would again come up tomorrow, he would not consume the time of the Senate by discussing it further at present.

The PRESIDENT stated that the rules of the Senate admitted of no doubt on the subject. The members of the body, in submitting resolutions, acted on their responsibility to the Senate and the country for the proper or improper exercise of the right, and in this differed from individuals whose petitions were presented in this body. While the rule existed there could be no question of the right. If it was the wish of the Senate to alter the rule, he would with pleasure conform to it, as his only object was to perform the duty of Presiding Officer with strictness and impartiality.

Mr. MORRIS withdrawing the proposition to print, the resolution was laid on the table.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read the third time and passed:

An act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1839; and

An act to provide for the location and temporary support of the Seminole Indians removed from Florida.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Paxson was taken up; and the question on its engrossment was decided in the negative—ayes 14, noes 15.

So the bill was rejected.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the armed occupation of that part of the Territory of Florida which is overrun by hostile Indians.

Mr. BENTON submitted some amendments to improve the details of the bill; which were adopted; after which,

Mr. PRESTON observed, that, as the chairman of the committee yesterday expressed a wish that some motion should be made to test the sense of the Senate on the general principles of this bill, he would now move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BENTON called for the yeas and nays on the question; which, being ordered, the motion prevailed—yeas 23, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, McKean, Merriek, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Wall, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—19.

Mr. ROBINSON moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken, stating that, not being within the Chamber when the question was propounded, he voted under a misapprehension, and believed that he was voting for the bill.

Messrs. BENTON and LUMPKIN spoke in favor of the reconsideration.

After which, on taking the question, the reconsideration was ordered, without a division; and the bill was laid on the table till to-morrow.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

A bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands of the United States;

A bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company;

A bill for the relief of Captain Snodgrass's company of Alabama volunteers;

A bill to regulate the pay of masters in the Navy;

A bill for the relief of John McCloud;

A bill to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, in the State of Vermont; and

A bill for the relief of Ephraim Sprague.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following motion; which was read, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the bill before the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Bulow, jr., deceased," and all other bills before the Senate providing for the payment of claims of sufferers by the late Indian wars in the Territory of Florida, and in the States of Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama, be recommended to the Committee on Claims, with instructions that the committee examine, and report to the Senate, whether facts are before the committee or the body, upon which a judgment can be formed as to the extent and character of the claims for indemnity to grow out of these wars; of the extent of those claims which will be embraced within the principles of the bills already reported for the action of the Senate; and, if so, to report further a general bill in conformity with the principles which they shall suppose ought to be adopted for the settlement of those claims, the facts and testimony upon which their conclusions are founded, and the amount of claims to be embraced within the legislation they may propose.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to construct a national armory in the West.

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 6, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read,

Mr. HAYNES rose and said he would make another effort to dispose of the President's annual message, if the House would indulge him, and he would therefore ask leave to submit a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union therefrom.

Mr. KENNEDY moved a call of the House; which was lost.

Mr. HAYNES was going on to remark on the importance of that portion of it which related to the census; when

Mr. SHIELDS objected.

Mr. HAYNES moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, suggested to the gentleman to move a discharge of the committee from so much of the message as related to the census, and Mr. M. would vote for it.

Mr. HAYNES replied that he was not disposed to leave the opportunity open for it again to be said that the President's message had not been referred.

The question on suspending was then taken; and resulted in the negative, two thirds not voting therefor—yeas 75, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Borden, Bouldin, Buchanan, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Cleveland, Clowney, Craig, Cushman, De Graff, Edwards, Ewing, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Gray, Harrison, Haynes, Holt, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Lincoln, Marvin, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Montgomery, Morgan, Noble, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Pennybacker, Pettrikin, Phelps, Plumer, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reilly, Rives, Robinson, Sheffer, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Toucey, Turney, Vanderveer, Weeks, Whittelsey, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Bell, Biddle, Bond, William B. Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dunn, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, Grennell, Harper, Henry, Herod, Henry Johnson, Kennedy, Mallory, Sampson, Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKean, Menefee, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Ridgway, Robertson, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Word—59.

Mr. KENNEDY asked the consent of the House to take up and consider the resolution submitted by him some time since, calling for certain information in relation to the contracts of the Navy Department.

Objection being made,

Mr. KENNEDY moved a suspension of the rules, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on his call, they were taken, and were—yeas 96 nays 60.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

At the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, and by unanimous consent, reports from committees were called for.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, moved the discharge of that committee from the further consideration of the petition of Gamaliel L. Smith, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims, which was agreed to.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the Committee on Commerce, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Lemuel C. Richmond.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Stephen White and Samuel Fettyplace.

On motion of Mr. WORD, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of certain citizens of Missouri, praying a cession of swamp lands.

Mr. KEMBLE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Ann C. Stephen.

Mr. GRENELL, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William Callender.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Martha Laman, Simon Brewion, and Edmund Leavenworth.

Mr. BOND, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Mrs. Anne Royal.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Barbary Burnham.

Mr. CHILDS, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Rachel Fox.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Frederick Lantz, Job Wood, Peter Heeston, Daniel Wilson, and David R. Whitely.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Samuel Day and Benjamin Wood.

Mr. HEROD, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Daniel Shipley.

Mr. ALLAN, of Vermont, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Ephraim Shaler.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Patents, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Amelia Wells.

On motion of Mr. CONNER, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the House of the 14th ultimo authorizing an inquiry into the expediency of permitting publications on agriculture to be conveyed by mail, free of postage.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of sundry citizens of the town of, and vicinity of, Mapleville, in the county of Bibb, State of Alabama, praying compensation sufficient to secure the services of a postmaster to perform the extraordinary duties required at that post office.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the select committee on steam engines, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers relating to the alleged invention of Cadwallader Evans, the subject being properly cognizable by the commissioner appointed under the act of last session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the select committee thereon, reported a joint resolution in favor of the heirs of Colonel David Rumsey; which was postponed till Saturday next.

Mr. HUNTER, from the select committee on the subject, reported a bill to provide for the collection and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr. PICKENS moved to print five thousand extra copies of the report; but it being objected to, the motion lies over.

ARMY BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Army service bill for 1839.

The question pending was the amendment moved yesterday by Mr. MERCER, "for the prosecution of surveys under the act of the 30th of April, 1834, $30,000."

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the following substitute, "for arrearages of surveys under the act of 30th of April, 1824, $4,000," and produced a letter from Colonel Abert, chief of the topographical bureau, showing the latter sum to be all that was required at present under that act.

Mr. MERCER opposed the amendment as not providing for a further execution of the law, a law which was still in force. Mr. M. produced a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending the larger sum. Mr. M. insisted that it was the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to provide for carrying out that law.

Mr. BELL complained of this mode of shifting responsibility from the Executive shoulders, by these private estimates sent in from time to time, without, in many instances, the slightest privacy on the part of the House, and by which members of that House were often held alone responsible for appropriations which had been recommended by the Executive.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, remarking that a bill having been reported this morning providing $10,000 for the carrying on and completing of military surveys, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HOLSEY made a general reply to the positions assumed by Mr. MERCER and Mr. BELL.

Mr. PICKENS contended that the act of 1824 only authorized an appropriation of $30,000 for that one year, and not, as Mr. MERCER insisted, from year to year. Mr. P. was opposed to the continuance of the appropriation on constitutional grounds, because, though if confined to military surveys only, they would come within the pale of the Constitution, but it was notorious that these surveys, as they had for years been carried on, formed the bases upon which the internal improvement system was constructed. The amount of $30,000 was but a trifle, yet he looked to the enormous expenditure involved in, and brought about by, these surveys.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, also opposed the amendment of Mr. MERCER, and regarded it as both unconstitutional and inexpedient. Mr. G. then went into a general argument against the proposition, as productive of works of internal improvement, and involving immense appropriations, often for improvements which, but for these surveys, would never have been thought of. Mr. G. had heard much about economy and reform, and he asked when and where were they to begin? Where could there be a more fit and suitable occasion than on these surveys; especially, too, when the Treasury was empty? If these new surveys were authorized, gentlemen would be asking for harbors, clearing rivers and creeks, constructing light-houses, &c., and as so much had been said for some time past on the necessity of economy, here was the place to test the sincerity of men of all parties, because the interest of almost all were involved. For himself, Mr. G. had always opposed these propositions as unconstitutional.

Mr. EVANS advocated the amendment as complying with the provisions of an existing law.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, contended that if the House rejected this amendment, the advocates of strict construction would not attain their object, for the surveys, if not made under the law of 1824, would be made in some other way, and as much money would be indirectly appropriated as if the matter were openly and avowedly voted for. He denied that the great principle adverted to by Mr. PICKENS and Mr. GARLAND was involved in this proposition, though, if it was, he should vote for it, though he was not in favor of an extravagant scheme of internal improvements. He eulogized the law of 1824 as having given birth to many a splendid work in the States, that, but for it, would never, perhaps, have been constructed.

Mr. TAYLOR said, because appropriations had been made in consequence of the act of 1824, he did not deem it obligatory upon Congress to continue them, for he denied that that act was prospective in its operation, but was limited to the year of its passage; and he, for one, was not disposed to continue them. Moreover, the proposition was of too general and indefinite a character, and should not be adopted unless the House knew what specific surveys were to be made, so that they might judge of their nationality. He was willing to go for a survey of this character, but for nothing more.

Mr. HOWARD remarked that the gentleman's own rule should induce him to vote for this appropriation, for, although it was true that the sum of $30,000 was asked for in gross, yet the communication of the Secretary of War had specified the surveys proposed to be made for the coming year.

After some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND and CRAIG, in opposition, and Mr. CARTER, in favor of the amendment, Mr. PETRIKIN obtained the floor, and moved the previous question; which the House, by tellers, refused to second, there being 65 for, and 67 against it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed the hope that if gentlemen were determined to have this appropriation, it would be done in a separate bill, and made specific. He said the law of 1824, which this amendment in effect goes to revive, places in the hands of the President a power which he wished not to see given again to any person; that it gave him absolute power to go through every State of the Union, to make what surveys he pleased. He hoped that there was no party in this House disposed to do the like act; and if it were necessary to appropriate this amount to surveys, that there were other bills in which this amendment might, with more propriety, be inserted. He appealed to the House, therefore, not to append it to the Army bill, but to appropriate it by specific law, and place it upon its own merits.

Mr. ROBINSON was understood to be opposed to the amendment on the ground that it would revive the act of 1824. He was opposed to the whole system of internal improvements, and contended that it was a war upon the Constitution.

Before taking any question,

On motion of Mr. MURRAY, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 7, 1839.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, praying Congress to cause piers to be constructed at Delaware city, at the eastern debouch of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, for the protection of ships in the winter season; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEVIER presented a memorial of the clerks of the Indian Bureau, praying that their compensation may be raised to an equality with that of other clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. S. also presented papers, which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. YOUNG presented four memorials from a number of citizens of the northern part of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a land office in that portion of the State; which was laid upon the table.

Mr. RUGGLES presented a letter from Robert Schuyler, upon the subject of steam boilers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented a memorial, signed by a number of the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the interference of the citizens of other parts of the country in the subject of slavery in the District, and against any action on the part of Congress in compliance with such unauthorized interference.

After giving an abstract of the contents of the memorial, Mr. C. said he would embrace the opportunity of presenting his views on the subject of these abolition petitions. He said he had been, and was still, of the opinion that the proper course for the disposal of these petitions would have been to receive them and refer them to an appropriate committee, who might present to the community a strong and argumentative appeal on the subject. A majority of the Senate thought otherwise; and while they had no intention to violate the right of petition, the course which they had adopted had enabled the Abolitionists to represent them as having done so, and thereby greatly to increase their numerical strength. He said that the petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District and in the Territories were but a means of accomplishing the ultimate aim of the Abolitionists—universal emancipation. They were stages, and short stages, to a bloody goal—emancipation without compensation, and without moral preparation. For this they were attempting to excite the people of one section of the Union against another section, by exaggerated pictures of the horrors of slavery. Hence their continual agitation of the subject, and their attempt to connect it with the political controversies of the country. He alluded to the distinguished agitator in another sphere, (O'Connell,) who has said that we should be excluded from the respectable society of Europe—a society to which he himself has only a kind of contraband admittance, and was tolerated with a scornful repugnance. He considered his ebullitions as the malignant ravings of the plunderer of his own country, and the libeler of a kindred people. He said that persons of both sections, and of the different political parties of the Union, have endeavored to profit by the abolition excitement.

Previous to the late presidential election, Mr. Van Buren had been charged with being an Abolitionist. He (Mr. C.) never participated or believed in this charge. No, sir, he is no Abolitionist. He conjured Abolitionists to pause, and look on the dreadful precipice towards which they were hurrying our beloved country. He denied that Congress had any power to legislate upon the subject of slavery. He said that by the Missouri compromise, Florida had a right, when she had the requisite population, to be admitted into the Union with the institution of slavery. He denied the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, so long as slavery did not interfere with the comfortable occupation of the District as a seat of Government for the Union, which was provided by the act of cession. The idea of Congress having power to prohibit the transportation of slaves from one State to another was preposterous. He said that the ultimate aim of Abolitionists was emancipation, the universal emancipation of three million slaves in the United States. These were, on an average, worth at least $400 each; and thus would result the destruction of property to the amount of $1,200,000,000 by a single fiat of legislation. It was said there was no right of property in slaves; but that was property which the laws made property. If Abolitionists were sincere, they should begin, as a preliminary step, to raise these $1,200,000,000, for it would be the height of injustice to ask citizens of slaveholding States to raise money to pay for their own property. He said that the Abolitionists, whatever they might profess, were in favor of amalgamation, and supposed, as the leading white Abolitionists evinced no disposition to commence the work, that they intended it should be carried out by the poorer class, who were expected to consent to the vile and loathsome association. He said that the two colors could not associate together on terms of equality; the whites must rule the blacks, or the blacks would rule them; that contests for superiority would inevitably take place, and widely extended carnage and desolation would be the result. Our country, with its happy population, its smiling cities, and well cultivated plantations, would present nought but desolated fields, conflagrated cities, and scenes of butchery and murder. Mr. C. illustrated and defended these and other positions in an able speech of nearly two hours in length, which will be presented to our readers after it is published.

Mr. CALHOUN said that when he turned his eyes back for the last twelve months, and compared what he then heard with what was now said, in the same quarter, he was forcibly struck, and, he might say, pleasantly, with the change. I think (said he) that it was just about one year since that the Senate was engaged in the discussion of a series of resolutions relating to the same subject on which we have heard the Senator today, and which occupied the time of this body for about two weeks, in the discussion of what many were pleased to call useless abstractions. At that time abolition was advancing with strides which threatened the Union itself. To meet the approaching danger, he (Mr. C.) turned his eyes to State-rights, as the ark of our safety, and which has, heretofore, carried us safely through every difficulty. The resolutions to which he referred were put forward as the rallying ground for all who embraced the State-rights creed. How they were received on the Opposition side, he would not say; but on this side he was ably supported by his Republican friends of the North, the grateful recollection of which he should ever retain. That movement gave the first effectual blow to abolition.

At the close of the session, it was followed up by the address to the people of the United States, which was headed by the Senator from Connecticut on my right, [Mr. NILES.] It took the same elevated ground, that this was not a consolidated Government, but a Federal Republic of confederated sovereignties; and that neither this Government, nor any of the States, or their citizens, had a right, either here or elsewhere, to interfere with the domestic institutions of the other States. This address, following the original move, had a powerful effect in consolidating all of the State-rights creed throughout the entire non-slaveholding States against the Abolitionists, which effectually checked their further progress.

At the beginning of this session, another movement on the same principle, made in the other wing of the Capitol, (Mr. ATHERTON's resolutions,) and which was sustained by a strong majority, followed with the most happy effect. The work was done. The spirit of abolition was overthrown, of which we have a strong confirmation in what we have this day heard. The South was consolidated as one man against it, and a great political party to the North was nearly equally united in opposition; and he hoped, from indications that could scarcely deceive, that the other party there would also soon be found rallied against it.

Sir, this is a great epoch in our political history. Of all the dangers to which we have ever been exposed, this has been the greatest. We may now consider it as passed. The resolutions to which he referred, with the following movements, gave the fatal blow, to which the position now assumed by the Senator from Kentucky has given the finishing stroke. What has been done, will be followed by a great moral revolution in the tone of feeling and thinking in reference to the domestic institutions of the South. Already the discussion has effected a great change among ourselves. There were many, very many, in the slaveholding States who, at the commencement of the controversy, believed that slavery, as it existed among us, was an evil to be tolerated, because we could not escape from it, but not to be defended. That has passed away. We now believe it has been a great blessing to both of the races—the European and African, which, by a mysterious Providence, has been brought together in the southern section of this Union. The one has greatly improved, and the other has not deteriorated; while, in a political point of view, it has been the great stay of the Union and our free institutions, and one of the main sources of the unbounded prosperity of the whole. Now that we have withstood the shock, our institutions would be viewed more fairly than they have heretofore been; and he had no apprehension but that the result would be a great change of feeling towards them, not only in our country, but over the civilized world.

I did not rise, to enter into a discussion of the subject. I heard the Senator from Kentucky with pleasure. His speech will have a happy effect, and will do much to consummate what had already been so happily begun, and successfully carried on towards a completion.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the act for the relief of John L. Allen, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate of January 23d, made a report thereon, concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions of the Senate of the 23d January last, respecting territorial banking institutions, and the extension of the jurisdiction of the courts over the same; and that the second of the said resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act for the relief of Samuel McComb; and An act for the relief of Henry Lynch.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they should not pass:

An act for the relief of Chastelain and Ponvert;
An act for the relief of Zachariah Jellison;
An act for the relief of Samuel D. Walker;
An act for the relief of James W. Osborne; and An act for the relief of John B. Lassala.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which memorials on the subjects had been referred, reported the following bills; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading:

A bill for the relief of William A. Whitehead; and

A bill to remit or refund duties on railroad iron imported by the Wrightsville and York railroad company.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Milwaukee, in the Territory of Wisconsin; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred an act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be issued to Us-se-yoholo, a Creek Indian, a patent for a certain reservation of land in the State of Alabama, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do not pass:

An act for the relief of Milly Yates;
An act for the relief of Willis Stevens;
An act for the relief of Poas Hadjo;
An act for the relief of Joseph Dukes; and An act for the relief of John Baldrige.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Henry Fry, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MORRIS, from the same committee, to which petitions on the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel White and a bill for the relief of William Terry; which were read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of an alteration in the pension laws, reported that the same was inexpedient.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill supplementary to an act granting lots to Columbia College in the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the resolution of the Senate, directing them to inquire into the claim of John J. Catlett, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

A bill for the relief of James Selden; and

A bill for the relief of George Innis.

On motion of Mr. McKEAN, it was Resolved, That the documents on the files of the Senate in relation to the claims of the heirs of Benjamin Harvey be again referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions to report thereon.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. WRIGHT was adopted, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill for the relief of William B. Ferguson and others, was read the third time and passed.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 7, 1839.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the select committee of twenty-six, on the subject of the public lands, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee report to the House, and ask leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject-matters referred to them, and that the journal of the committee be reported and published.

Resolved, further, That the committee deem it inexpedient to take further steps on the subject of the public lands.

Mr. ROBERTSON, one of the committee, expressed his dissent from the report, and moved to recommit it, with instructions to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert as follows:

That hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause separate accounts to be kept of all moneys paid into the Treasury on account of sales of the public lands, to be disposed of in the manner herein provided, unless otherwise by law specially directed, viz.: he shall, on the 1st day of July succeeding the next census, and hereafter semi-annually on the 1st days of July and January in every year, divide all the said moneys then in the Treasury among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of their federal numbers: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands, or such portion thereof as may be requisite to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government for any year in which the receipts from the customs and other sources of revenue should be estimated to fall below — million dollars, and when it shall be deemed proper on that account to apply the said proceeds to special appropriations to supply the deficiency and meet those expenditures: Provided, also, That in the event of a war between the United States and any foreign Power, the said semi-annual division shall cease and be suspended during the continuance of such war: Provided, moreover, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the right and obligation of Congress, whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that benefits from the use of the public lands, or the proceeds thereof, have been heretofore, or shall be hereafter, conferred on particular States, to extend, as far as practicable, to each and all the States, in their due and just proportions, who may require, or be willing to accept them, similar benefits upon the same or equivalent terms.

Mr. R. addressed the House at length in support of his proposition, and went into the history of the action of the various States of the Union on the subject of a disposition of the public lands. Mr. R. kept the floor till the orders of the day were announced.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the act of Congress of the 3d March, 1839, I herewith transmit to Congress the tenth annual report of the board of inspectors of the penitentiary of Washington.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1839.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following executive communications:

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th ultimo, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, giving information of the whole amount of the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, the amount granted for bounty and public services, the amount surveyed, the amounts ceded to the States and Territories and reserved for purposes of education, &c., the entire cost to the Government of all public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and the quantities of land that have remained unsold by the latest return, &c., &c.

A communication from the Secretary of War, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th instant, transmitting a report from the colonel of the topographical engineers, accompanied by a report and drawings of the harbor of Stonington, Connecticut.

A communication from the Secretary of War, in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 28th ultimo, giving his opinion whether the improvements can be suspended or discontinued upon the harbors now in process of construction, without endangering the existence of the structures already begun, and without exposing the Government to a waste of the moneys already expended; showing, also, the average progress of these harbors towards completion, and how far the interests of commerce would be deleteriously affected by such suspension or discontinuance; accompanied by various documents relating to these subjects.

A communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Pensions, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st December, giving a statement of the number of pensions under the act of March 18, 1816, which have been relinquished, and other information respecting them.

A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, giving information as to what funds have been paid by that Department to William E. Woodruff, pension agent for the State of Arkansas.

A message from the President of the United States, forwarding the report of the commissioners appointed to test the usefulness of inventions to prevent the explosion of steam boilers.

A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the accounts of Thomas Irvine, district attorney for the western district of Pennsylvania.

Which several communications were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Petitions were, on leave, presented by Messrs. TILLINGHAST, NAYLOR, FLETCHER of Massachusetts, JOHNSON of Louisiana, KEMBLE, GOODE, and CRANSTON.

[Mr. KEMBLE submitted a joint resolution for the survey of the lakes on the northern and north-western confines of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented a petition, signed, it is believed, by several thousand citizens of the State of Louisiana, soliciting the entire repeal of the acts providing for the naturalization of foreigners, and that Congress will make provision, by law, for the protection of the United States from the indiscriminate influx of foreign emigrants, both of which they deem necessary for the preservation of our Republic and glorious institutions.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the petition was ordered to be printed, and was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.]

ARMY SERVICE BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army of the United States for the year 1839.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. MERCER to amend the bill by adding to the end thereof an appropriation of $30,000 for the prosecution of surveys under the act of 1824.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The main point of the debate on this proposed item was, whether the act of 1824 was prospective and continuous in its operation, or expired at the end of the year, or when the first appropriation made by it was expended. The opposers of Mr. MERCER's amendment insisted upon the limitation, and that the law was no longer in force; while its supporters contended that the act was a general one, and the money appropriated under it designed to be continued annually. The following is the law of 1824, the second and only other section merely appropriating $30,000 to carry out the requirement of the first:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, to be made of the routes of such roads and canals as he may deem of national importance, in a commercial or military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail; designating, in the case of each canal, what parts may be made capable of sloop navigation; the surveys, plans, and estimates, for each, when completed, to be laid before Congress."

Mr. MERCER again addressed the House at length in support of his proposition.

Mr. HOWARD moved a substitute for the amendment, by specifying the surveys to be made, the amount being the same.

Mr. HAYNES said he would intrude but a few moments upon the attention of the House. He said we had heard much about the act of 1824 and its obligations upon Congress to make appropriations for surveys. There was but one portion of that act obligatory upon any one. By it the President is required to present to Congress such objects of survey as, in his judgment, required its attention. Congress was left free, by the act referred to, to appropriate, or not appropriate, money for surveys, as, in its judgment, may seem proper. As had been justly observed by his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] the act of 1824 imposed on Congress no obligation to appropriate any particular sum, as the appropriation of that year was merely an annual appropriation. If it had been intended to be perpetual, that intention would have been expressed in the act, and further annual appropriations would have since been unnecessary.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] had stated to the House that, since 1824, about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars had been appropriated under the act referred to. This shows those appropriations had not been annually repeated, as it would only cover about eight years of the thirteen, at the rate of thirty thousand dollars per annum. But he had risen merely to ask the House, if $30,000 had been the maximum appropriation for surveys annually, when the Treasury was unembarrassed, are we prepared to increase it to the unusual amount of $55,000 when, if appropriations should be made according to the annual estimates, the ways and means must be provided by the creation of a national debt? Already the Committee on Military Affairs had reported a bill asking an appropriation of $10,000 for military surveys; and the Committee on Commerce had asked an additional sum of $15,000 for commercial surveys; and the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] asked for $30,000 more. He again asked, is the House prepared, with an exhausted Treasury, to exceed the usual appropriation for surveys $25,000?

Mr. MARVIN obtained the floor; and, the subjects being connected, availed himself of the opportunity to conclude his speech upon the internal improvement system, the constitutionality of which he maintained at great length.

Mr. MALLORY then obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment; but yielded it to

Mr. CAMBRELENG, who expressed a wish to have all the appropriation bills made the special order from day to day, till disposed of.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. BELL suggested to make this bill the special order for to-morrow and next day.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had no objection; and he asked leave to submit a motion to that effect, but it was objected to; and Mr. C. then moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. POPE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he must ask for the yeas and nays; for, unless his motion prevailed, it would be fatal to the appropriation bills, for nearly all next week would be taken up by other special orders.

The yeas and nays being ordered,

Mr. POPE withdrew his motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG modified his motion so as to make the bill the order for to-morrow and Saturday, also, if not sooner disposed of, and to take it up after the morning business.

Mr. PETRIKIN then renewed the motion to adjourn; but the yeas and nays having been again ordered, on the call of Mr. CAMBRELENG, he withdrew it.

The motion to suspend the rules was decided in the negative—yeas 93, nays 60; not two thirds.

Mr. HAYNES then demanded the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. INGHAM and Mr. CAMBRELENG simultaneously called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 57, nays 91.

So the House refused to adjourn; and the question recurred on the demand for the previous question; when

Mr. NAYLOR moved a call of the House; which was lost.

The demand for the previous question was seconded—83 to 53.

Mr. MERCER called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; but they were refused; and the main question was ordered, put, and agreed to without a division.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was then read a third time, and passed.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 8, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23d ultimo, in relation to the exercise of banking privileges by incorporated companies or individuals in the Territories of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial from inhabitants of Ohio city, in relation to the neutrality laws; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from merchants and others, citizens of Philadelphia, praying Congress to make the necessary appropriations to erect a new custom-house for that district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the petition of Colin Bishop, postmaster at Tusculum, Alabama; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of Thomas B. Crittenden; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the synopsis of a bill before the British Parliament for reducing and equalizing letter postage; which was ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred an act for the relief of Isaac Conly, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation against their passage:

An act for the relief of George Hommel;

An act for the relief of Maria Hornbeck;

An act for the relief of Thompson Hutchinson; and

An act for the relief of George Cassidy.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same with amendments:

An act for the settlement of the accounts of Edmund Roberts; and

An act for the relief of Benjamin Hewitt.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation for their indefinite postponement:

An act for the relief of Cornelius Manning; and

An act for the relief of Benjamin Hodges.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Dudley Walker, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill more effectually to secure public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters, reported the same with amendments; and the bill and amendments were ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, reported the same with an amendment; which was ordered to be printed, and, on his motion, it was made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred so much of the memorial of Maria Helen America Vespucci as relates to conferring upon her the right of citizenship, reported against the expediency of any alteration of the law of Congress establishing a uniform mode of naturalization, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 29th ultimo, reported a bill for the relief of the assignees to reservations under the Choctaw treaty of 1830; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the act for the relief of the legal representatives of William Tudor, jr., reported the same without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Abel A. Pasko, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the act for the relief of Etienne Lalande, reported the same with out amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred an act for the relief of Daniel Ward and George Ficklin, reported the same without amendment.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing additional ground for the use of the custom-house in Mobile.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the Senate the annual amount of net revenue collected from all sources in each year for the last ten years, designating, as far as it can conveniently be done, the several kinds of goods from which revenue derived from imports is raised, and the amount derived from each kind in each year, and also the rate of duty.

SLAVERY QUESTION.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MORRIS, on Wednesday, on the subject of slavery, coming up for consideration,

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, demanded the question of its consideration.

Mr. NORVELL said it was very evident that the consideration of this resolution would lead to a long and interminable abolition discussion, and every Senator must be convinced that this would be productive of no good result. For the purpose, therefore, of getting rid of the resolution, he moved to lay the question of its consideration on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. BUCHANAN requested the Senator from Michigan to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. NORVELL assented.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should vote against the proposition to lay upon the table. From his whole course on the subject of these abolition petitions he supposed no person would suspect him of being friendly to them or to their objects; but fair play is a jewel, and he thought that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] had a right to be heard; and to reply to the remarks that were made in the Senate on this subject yesterday. That being done, he was willing to take any course which might put the subject effectually at rest.

Mr. HUBBARD said that there was no want of "fair play" in the course proposed by the Senator from Michigan. What is proposed? The Senator from Ohio has submitted to the Senate a resolution upon the subject of domestic slavery—a resolution embracing subjects important in their character; and if this resolution be now taken up, in his opinion, it would inevitably lead to debate. The Senator from Alabama raises the question of consideration, and the Senator from Michigan moves to lay that question on the table. The object is manifestly to avoid discussion at this time; and this was, in his judgment, the course which ought to be pursued upon the resolution. But the Senator from Ohio is not thereby precluded from offering his views upon the subject of slavery. He can, if he pleases, in imitation of the example set by the Senator from Kentucky yesterday, present his views at large on offering to the Senate a memorial on that subject. This right he has, this privilege he now enjoys, if he chooses to exercise it, and he knew of no rule of the Senate which could prevent him or any Senator from going fully into the subject of any memorial he might be called upon to present. But he did hope that the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio would not be taken up for consideration. If once before the Senate, it would be debated, and such a debate could lead to no profitable result. At this period of the session, he was utterly opposed to bringing that resolution before the Senate, and he should, with great pleasure, vote in favor of the motion of his friend from Michigan.

Mr. MORRIS felt very much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for the information that he had the same right as any other Senator to express his opinions on subjects brought before that body. He supposed that he ought to return him profound thanks for this gracious privilege. Mr. M. proceeded to comment on the course of Senators with much severity, when he was called to order by the President.

Mr. M. wished to know in what he was out of order; in the language he had used, or—

The PRESIDENT said the motion made by the Senator from Michigan was not a debatable one, and therefore all discussion on it was out of order.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the motion to consider on the table, (the yeas and nays having been ordered,) and decided in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Monton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Spence, and White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, Williams of Maine, and Young—20.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

An act for the relief of Captain Snodgrass's company of Alabama volunteers;

An act for the relief of Ephraim Sprague;

An act for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company;

An act granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands of the United States, and for other purposes;

An act to regulate the pay of masters of the Navy;

An act to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, in the State of Vermont; and

An act for the relief of John McLeod.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections being the special order, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then offered to amend the bill by striking out the penalty imposed, of a fine of $500 and incapacity to hold office under the United States, and to insert, in lieu thereof, a clause, that any person offending against the provisions of the act shall forthwith be removed from office by the President of the United States.

Mr. NORVELL called for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. KING hoped his friend from Michigan would withdraw his call for the yeas and nays. He was opposed to the bill as it stood, and as the author proposed to amend it, and should vote against it in either shape. But he would prefer that the Senator should modify his bill to suit himself; and then, said Mr. K., let him go on to explain it, and endeavor to make it palatable to the Senate.

Mr. NORVELL accordingly withdrew his call for the yeas and nays, saying, that as he was opposed to the bill in any shape, he was averse to the Senate's taking a vote that would seem to imply an approval of any principle in it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then said that he would postpone for the present taking the question on the amendment, and went on to address the Senate at length in support of the bill, and in opposition to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary; on the conclusion of which,

On motion of Mr. WALL, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, February 8, 1839.

The SPEAKER announced, as the unfinished business of the morning hour, the report made yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the select committee on the public lands. The pending question being on Mr. ROBERTSON's substitute.

Mr. ROBERTSON was entitled to the floor; but yielded it temporarily for the following:

Mr. YELL, on leave, laid on the table the following amendment to Mr. ROBERTSON's proposition, giving notice he should move it when in order to do so:

Sec. 3. And he it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, report a correct estimate of the annual amount of money received and paid into the public Treasury, arising from the sales of the public land since the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and, also, the annual appropriations for each State since the adoption of the Constitution, and the pro rata amount received by each out of the amount of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands annually, and the aggregate amount either in money or land: Provided, however, That no State shall receive the benefit of this act until all the States in this Union shall have received an equal amount, placing all upon an equality, according to the fixed basis of the representation, and according to the true intent and meaning of the several deeds of cession.

Mr. LOOMIS, on leave granted, moved to print ten thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the whole amount of the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, the amount granted for bounty and public services, the amount surveyed, the amounts ceded to the States and Territories, and reserved for purposes of education, &c.; the entire cost to the Government of all public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished; and the quantities of land that have remained unsold by the latest return, &c., together with another report made on the same subject some days since. Mr. L. explained that these documents were very important, and would not exceed a single octavo sheet.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested twenty thousand, which Mr. L. accepted, and so modified, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAPMAN, on leave, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported without amendment, Senate bill for the benefit of the Florida, Alabama, and Georgia Railroad Company; which was committed.

Mr. ROBERTSON then proceeded with his remarks on the subject of the public lands, citing the expressions of various States thereon; and he then went on to detail what had been done in the committee, and the proceedings therein on the sundry propositions offered by different members, causing them to be read at the Clerk's table. Mr. R. again held the floor until the orders of the day were called for.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that, on Monday next, he should ask the House to proceed with the remainder of the appropriation bills, that not being petition, but resolution day.

JAMES P. CARLTON.

The bill for the relief of James P. Carlton, on its third reading, was taken up.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, on leave, made a report in favor of the claim.

The question pending, however, was the motion of Mr. REED to recommit the bill to the above committee.

After a debate, in which Mr. THOMAS advocated the passage of the bill, and Mr. CONNOR opposed, the latter gentleman moved to lay the same upon the table; and upon that motion

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, demanded the yeas and nays; which were refused.

The question was then taken, and the bill was laid upon the table—yeas 73, noes 56.

BENJAMIN FRY.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry, on its third reading, was taken up; and, after a few words from Mr. TOUCEY, in explanation, it was read the third time and passed.

RETURN B. BROWN.

The bill for the relief of Return B. Brown, on its third reading, was briefly opposed by Mr. CRAIG, who moved to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Messrs. EVERETT, HOWARD, TOUCEY, and McKENNAN supported the bill, and Messrs. CRAIG and PETRIKIN opposed it; when

Mr. McKENNAN demanded the previous question, which was carried, and the bill was passed by a vote of 95 to 30.

GENERAL J. E. WOOL.

The bill allowing certain extra rations to General John E. Wool, coming up on its third reading, was opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, MALLORY, GIDDINGS, PETRIKIN, and McKAY, and it was advocated by Messrs. TAYLOR, THOMPSON, HOFFMAN, and LEGARE, when

Mr. McKAY moved to lay the bill on the table; on which motion

Mr. MALLORY demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 82, nays 65.

So the bill was laid on the table.

RECONSIDERATION—B. FRY.

Mr. CRAIG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry was passed.

The motion was advocated by Mr. CRAIG, and opposed by Mr. TOUCEY; when

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the question was taken on the motion to reconsider, and decided in the negative.

SALT LICK RESERVATION.

The bill for the relief of certain settlers living on what is called the Salt Lick reservation in the western district of Tennessee, was next taken up.

After a few remarks from Mr. MAY,

Mr. CHAMBERS moved the previous question; and upon a division of the House, it was ascertained that no quorum voted; whereupon,

Mr. VANDERVEER moved that there be a call of the House, which was ordered; and one hundred and thirty-one members having answered to their names,

On motion of Mr. SHIELDS, all further proceeding in the call was suspended.

The motion for the previous question being seconded, the main question was then ordered; upon which,

Mr. CONNOR demanded the yeas and nays, which the House refused to order; and the question was taken on the passage of the bill; but there appearing, on count, only 69 for, and 41 against it, no quorum voting,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved the House adjourn; and upon that motion

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, demanded the yeas and nays; which being refused, the question was then taken on the adjournment, and determined in the negative.

The question then recurred upon the passage of the bill; upon which question, on the motion of Mr. ADAMS, the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 90, nays 52.

So the bill was passed.

RECONSIDERATION—J. P. CARLTON.

Mr. FLETCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of James P. Carlton was laid upon the table; and the question upon the same was postponed until to-morrow.

LOOMIS C. BASSETT.

The bill for the relief of Loomis C. Bassett and others was taken up, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE FISHER.

The bill for the settlement of the claims of George Fisher was next taken up; and after a few remarks from Mr. CHAMBERS in opposition, and Mr. DOWNING in favor of its passage,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to recommit the same to the Committee of Claims.

A further debate ensued, in which Messrs. BELL, CLOWNEY, and McKENNAN advocated, and Mr. PETRIKIN opposed its passage; but before coming to any decision,

On motion of Mr. POTTS, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Saturday, February 9, 1839.

The VICEPRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, relative to the expenses incurred in negotiating and concluding the treaty with the Cherokee Indians; which,

On motion of Mr. WHITE, was laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT also announced a communication from the War Department, inclosing a report from the same officer, in relation to the commissions allowed for the adjudication of claims under the Cherokee treaty; which was also laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the Committee on Pensions had leave to employ a clerk.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the communication from Colonel Alden Partridge and Edmund Burke, in behalf of the military State convention of the State of Vermont, lately assembled at Montpelier, in that State, recommending a plan for the reorganization of the militia of the United States.

Mr. HUBBARD supported the motion, and spoke of the great value of the document, and the distinguished military skill of Colonel Partridge, one of its authors; after which the question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Enoch Giddings, asking to be compensated for an improvement in ordnance; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the petition of John W. Massey; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRIS presented a number of petitions from citizens of the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, one signed by a woman and her daughters, and two signed by Arthur Tappan, of New York, all praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the suppression of the trade in slaves between the States, and praying that no State may be admitted into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery.

Mr. M. addressed the Senate at great length, and with much warmth, in support of the objects of the petitioners, and, in concluding, moved that the petitions be received, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. LUMPKIN, the motion to receive the petitions was laid on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to amend the act of the 3d March, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to amend the judicial system of the United States;'" which was read twice and referred.

Mr. NORVELL, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill to alter the times of holding the circuit court of the United States for the district of Michigan; which was read twice and referred.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would ask leave on Monday next, to bring in a bill to grant the right of preemption to five hundred thousand acres of land to the Iron Mountain Company, in the State of Missouri, to aid said company in the construction of a railroad from the Iron mountain to the Mississippi river.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the bills from the House for the relief of John Brown, Richard Dexter, and Patrick Green, reported the two former without amendment, and the latter with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the bill from the House, to confirm the claim of Charles Morgan to a tract of land without amendment. Also, the bill from the House for the relief of the heirs of William Graham, deceased, with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of the legal representatives of — Bradford, deceased, recommending its passage.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to authorize the Washington County Turnpike Company, in Missouri, to construct a road through the public lands of the United States.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House were severally read twice and referred:

- A bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry;
- A bill for the relief of Return B. Brown;
- A bill for the relief of James Loomis and the heirs of James Bassett; and
- A bill for the relief of certain settlers living on the Salt Lick reservation, in the western district of Tennessee.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

Mr. BENTON moved to take up the bill for the armed occupation of that part of the Territory of Florida now overrun by bands of marauding Indians; which motion was agreed to.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Foster, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Wall, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—24.

Mr. BENTON offered several amendments to the details of the bill; which were adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, offered an amendment requiring the settler to be over eighteen years of age to be entitled to the grant of land provided in the bill; which was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill was ordered to be printed as amended, and laid on the table till Monday next.

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 9, 1839.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill for the relief of General Wool was yesterday laid on the table; and further moved to postpone the question until next Friday; which was agreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked leave to report a bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs; and it being objected to, Mr. P. moved a suspension of the rules; which did not prevail.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The unfinished business of the morning was then resumed, being the following resolution, reported by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the select committee of one from each State on the public lands:

Resolved, That the committee report to the House, and ask leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject-matters referred to them, and that the journal of the committee be reported and published.

Resolved further, That the committee deem it inexpedient to take further steps on the subject of the public lands.

The question pending was on the proposed substitute of Mr. ROBERTSON to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands semi-annually, to be suspended only in case of war.

Mr. ROBERTSON resumed his remarks in examination of the various resolutions that had been offered in the select committee by Messrs. HARRISON, YELL, and PICKENS, in relation to a disposition of the public lands. Mr. R. then went into a statement of the amount of land donated to the new States, to demonstrate the inequality and partiality of the compacts between them and the Federal Government.

The hour having expired, Mr. R. gave way without concluding, for the orders of the day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved a suspension of the rules to enable Mr. R. to conclude, but the House refused.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the acts of Congress, transmitting a statement of the balances due by receivers of public money, on the books of the Register of the Treasury, which have remained unsettled, or appear to have been due three years prior to the 30th September, 1838.

Also, a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, inclosing copies of correspondence between himself and William E. Woodruff, pension agent for the State of Arkansas, in the years 1837 and 1838, upon the subject of the funds furnished the latter for the payment of pensions.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. SHIELDS remarked that this was private business day, and it seemed to him that the House had already passed as many private bills as would be acted on by the other body this session; and he therefore hoped they would consent to take up and dispose of the public business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he had given notice that he should to-day call up the resolution in relation to the heirs of James Rumsey, and he should persist in his motion.

Mr. SHIELDS thereupon moved a suspension of the rules to attain his object.

Mr. LOOMIS suggested a modification to make the suspension general for public business alone for the residue of the session.

Mr. SHIELDS did not yield to the suggestion, and his own motion was negatived.

Mr. McKENNAN stated that Monday next was set apart for the consideration of territorial business, and he asked leave to make a report connected therewith.

Objection being made,

On Mr. M.'s motion, the rules were suspended, and he reported, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, a bill to authorize the construction of certain improvements in the Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMS, (the rules having been again suspended for the purpose,) from the Committee on Manufactures, reported with an amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the Alabama, Georgia, and Florida Railroad Company, viz., to extend the time of the payment of their duty-bonds.

Mr. LINCOLN, on leave, laid on the table an amendment to the bill reported yesterday from the Committee on the Public Lands, for the relief of the above company, giving notice he should move it when the bill came up; and the same was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRONSON laid on the table a communication in relation to the Territories; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of New York, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill granting to the judges of the supreme court of Iowa the same compensation as by law is given to the judges of Wisconsin.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING, the bill for the establishment of certain ports of entry in the Territory of Florida was recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOTY, on unanimous leave, laid on the table a substitute he proposed to move to one of the bills in relation to the Territory of Wisconsin, and it was ordered to be printed.

Several bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

PENSION AGENCY AT MONTPELIER.

The bill from the Senate for the establishment of a pension agency at Montpelier, Vermont, coming up,

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, moved that the bill be engrossed and read a third time; observing that the passing of this bill was but an act of common justice to the revolutionary patriots that still lingered among us. There were two pension agencies in Vermont; one at Windsor, on the extreme eastern, and the other at Burlington, on the extreme western, border of the State. Montpelier is the center and capital of the State. Many of the pensioners have to travel a greater distance to draw their pensions, to Windsor or Burlington, than it is from any section of the State to Montpelier. The section of the State accommodated by the passage of this bill—namely, Essex and Caledonia counties, &c.—travel directly through Montpelier in going to Burlington for their pensions, crossing the State from east to west. It was a great hardship to these pensioners, as well as unjust, to compel these invalid pensioners to travel a distance of eighty miles, going and coming, for their pensions, when, by passing this bill, their pensions can be paid at Montpelier, free of any expense to the Government; for the bill provides that the pensioners shall be paid free of cost and charges to the General Government. What, then, is the objection to the passage of this bill? What disadvantage can it be to the Government to establish this agency? None whatever. It is so just, so reasonable, that it is confidently hoped that the House will order it to be engrossed, read a third time, and pass the same.

Mr. ALLAN, of Vermont, moved to refer it to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions; for, he said, a bill of this character ought not to pass without undergoing the investigation of a committee.

Mr. FLETCHER expressed a hope that the bill would not take that course.

Mr. EVERETT was understood to advocate the commitment.

Mr. FLETCHER rejoined; when Mr. ALLAN's motion was agreed to.

JAMES RUMSEY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then called up the following joint resolution, reported by him a day or two ago from the select committee raised on the subject:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to present to James Rumsey, jr., the son and only child of James Rumsey, deceased, a suitable gold medal, commemorative of his father's services and high agency in giving to the world the benefits of the steamboat.

The motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD being agreed to,

Mr. RUMSEY addressed the House at length in support of the claims of his relative.

As soon as Mr. R. had concluded, the question was taken on the engrossment of the resolution, and it was ordered to a third reading this day nem. diss.

GEORGE FISHER.

The bill for the settlement of the claims of George Fisher came up on the motion of Mr. PETRIKIN to recommit the bill to the committee which reported it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, explained the merits of the claim; and after some further remarks from Messrs. BELL, DOWNING, and GLASCOCK, in support of the bill, and by Messrs. CHAMBERS, MERCER, and PETRIKIN, in opposition thereto,

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to lay the bill upon the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOWNING inquired whether it would be in order at that time to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER decided that it would not; and

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, to enable the gentleman from Florida to make that motion, moved a reconsideration of the vote; to which the House refused to agree.

Mr. SIBLEY suggested to the House the propriety of taking the same order in reference to the business on the Speaker's Calendar, as the House had adopted for that on the general Calendar, that is: to lay aside all bills causing debate, and act upon those claims to which there was no objection; to which suggestion, however, the House refused to accede.

The joint resolution granting a medal to James Rumsey, jr., reported in a former part of this day's proceedings, was read the third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of Lewis H. Bates and William Lacon next came up in order; and, after a few remarks from Messrs. CAMBRELENG and POPE in favor, and Messrs. CHAMBERS and PETRIKIN in opposition,

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered; and upon the question, "Shall the bill pass?" it was decided in the negative.

The bill for the relief of James H. Grant, Mars. W. Simpson, and Preston Going; and

The bill to compromise the claims of the United States against the Alleghany Bank of Pennsylvania, were read the third time and passed.

The joint resolution relating to the awards made by commissioners under the Choctaw treaty, came up in order, and was, on the motion of Mr. EVERETT, postponed until Monday next.

The bill for the relief of Griffith Combe and John P. Ingle, trustees of the house in the city of Washington commonly called the Brick Capitol, was read the third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of Jamison & Williams, which was passed on the 2d of February, came up in order; the question being on the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, on that day to reconsider the vote on the same; and after a few remarks from Mr. W. in favor of said motion, and in opposition to the principles involved in the bill, and Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, in opposition to the reconsideration,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; but the House refused to order the same; and the question on reconsidering was taken, and decided in the negative.

The bill for the relief of Cornelius Taylor, which passed on the same day as the above, and involving the same principles, and similarly situated, came up in order; when Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew his motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed.

The bill for the relief of Philip Lightfoot came up on its engrossment; and, after some remarks by Mr. ALLAN, of Vermont, in opposition, and Mr. TALIAFERRO in favor of, the passage of the same, and before coming to a decision upon the same,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CHAMBERS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; but the House refused to order them.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from W. B. Lewis, Second Auditor of the Treasury, transmitting copies of such accounts as have been rendered to that office by persons charged or intrusted with the disbursement or application of moneys, goods, or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, from the 1st October, 1837, to the 30th September, 1838; together with a statement containing a list of the names of all persons to whom goods, moneys, or effects have been delivered within the same period; prepared in obedience to an act of Congress of the 30th June, 1834.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th ultimo, transmitting a communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury, giving information of the condition of the balance due the United States by John Brahan, late receiver of the public money at Huntsville, Alabama.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 11, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 25th ultimo, on the subject of the abandonment of Fort Armstrong, in the State of Illinois, and the disposition subsequently made of it; and, on motion of Mr. YOUNG, it was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the American Silk Company; which, on motion of Mr. SEVIER, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of Daniel Rayan, on the subject of an improved financial system for the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of a number of citizens of the county of Plymouth, Massachusetts, praying for an appropriation to improve the harbor at the mouth of North river, in that State.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the preamble and joint resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, on the subject of the currency, and the various questions which have agitated the country; which were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of James Williams; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SOUTHWARD presented a report made in the Legislature of New Jersey, accompanied by certain resolutions on the subject of the disposition of the public lands; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of that State, deprecating any interference on the part of the Legislatures of the States, or of Congress, with the domestic institutions of the slaveholding States, without their consent; which, on his motion, was read, ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. LYON presented the petition of several young men, occupants and cultivators, but not "housekeepers by personal residence," on the public lands in Kalamazoo county, Michigan, praying Congress to so modify the existing law as to give them the right of preemption.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of the State of New York, presenting a plan for preventing accidents from the use of steam; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Alabama on the subject of the removal of obstructions at the Muscle shoals; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. MORRIS presented several petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and against the annexation of Texas to the Union; and moved that they be received.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the motion to receive them was laid on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the memorial of an individual who was sub-contractor under Farrow & Harris; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of Silas Buck, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Petitions were also presented by Messrs. WILLIAMS, of Maine, and NICHOLS; petitioners' names not heard.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill in relation to the town of Southport, in the Territory of Wisconsin; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. F., from the same committee, reported the bill making appropriations for certain military roads in the State of Arkansas.

On motion of Mr. F., the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the bills from the House for the relief of Richard Baxter and William Clark.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of certain umbrella manufacturers, reported the same with an amendment; which was read.

Also, with an amendment, the bill for the relief of Thomas Pritchard.

Mr. D., from the same committee, reported a bill to refund to Noah Miller and others part of the proceeds of a British sloop, which was sold for the benefit of the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, reported without amendment the bill from the House for the relief of Winslow Lewis.

Mr. K. also reported several House bills that had been referred to said committee.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred two memorials of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin on the subject, reported a bill making grants of land to said Territory, in aid of certain internal improvements; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. L., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill making grants of land to the Territory of Wisconsin in aid of certain internal improvements, moved to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, the objects of the bill being embraced in the one just reported by him; the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported without amendment the bills for the relief of Zebulon Baxter and Asa Clark.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, Daniel Steinrod had leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. KNIGHT, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Samuel Warner; which was read twice and referred.

MOUTHS OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate what has been done, or is doing, towards increasing the depth of water in the mouths of the Mississippi, the orders given, and the reports received in relation thereto, the amount of appropriation now necessary, if any, for the continuance of the work, and a detailed statement of the expenditures under former appropriations.

COMPROMISE ACT.

Mr. BENTON observed that some days ago, in the discussion of a bill then before the Senate, he had occasion to take some notice of the compromise act; and he then made a statement of what had passed in relation to it between himself and a gentleman who was then a Senator from the State of New Jersey, and head of the Committee on Manufactures. Since making that statement he had reason to address a letter to the gentleman whose name he mentioned (Governor Dickerson) on the subject, and he had received an answer which he would read to the Senate, and then let that answer stand as his statement.

Mr. B. then read the following:

SUCKASUNNY, NEW JERSEY, February 5, 1839.

DEAR SIR: Last evening I received yours of the 30th ultimo, which, no doubt, had been detained on the road a day or two in consequence of the heavy rain by which our country has been lately deluged.

Your letter contains an extract from the National Intelligencer, in which it is denied that Mr. WEBSTER had said to me that he had not been consulted as to the compromise bill, &c., and you ask for my recollections as to this fact. I hasten to relate to you the facts in this case, so far as I can now recollect them. On the day before Mr. CLAY introduced this bill into the Senate, he mentioned to me that he had given notice that he should ask leave to introduce the bill on the next day, some of the leading features of which he stated to me. I had not heard the notice given. He said he had intended to show me the bill, but had been prevented by a multiplicity of business in which he had been engaged, but that I should see it in the morning.

Next morning I waited upon Mr. WEBSTER, and asked him if he was aware that such a bill was to be introduced? He assured me that he was not, and that he had not been consulted upon it, and expressed himself strongly of the disapprobation with which such a measure would be received in New England.

In the morning I arrived at my seat some minutes after the business of the day had commenced, and I found that Mr. CLAY had made his motion for leave to introduce his bill. Had I arrived before the business of the day had commenced, no doubt I should have had the opportunity of perusing the bill before it was presented. As it was, I never saw it until it was in print.

Mr. WEBSTER, as well as myself, opposed this bill, and both voted against it. If you read the debates that took place in the Senate on the subject, on the 21st, 22d, and 23d February, 1833, I think you will be convinced that neither Mr. WEBSTER nor myself could have had any previous notice of this bill. I have not the file of papers by me, but you may easily find them at Washington. I will, however, refer you to Mr. WEBSTER's speech upon this bill, reported in Niles's Register, 4th series, volume 8, page 7, in which you will find abundant proof that he could not have been consulted as to its object or details. Among other expressions are these: "There was no expectation at the commencement of this short session that such a bill would be passed. The Senate had not had time to know the pleasure of their masters. No opportunity had been offered for obtaining a knowledge of either the course of public opinion, or the effect of this measure on the public interests." If Mr. WEBSTER had been consulted on this bill, would he have made such declarations? or, if made, would they have passed unanswered?

Mr. CLAY had previously stated to me his fears, that Mr. VERPLANK's bill, which he considered as an Administration measure, or some other bill originating from the same source, would pass, greatly to the injury, if not destruction, of the manufacturing interest of the country, and suggested the propriety of making further concessions, in addition to those of the law of 1832, as the only means of saving even a part of the protective system, but without stating what those concessions should be. I answered him that I did not fear Mr. VERPLANK's bill; that it could never pass; that it was already so altered and amended that I did not believe Mr. VERPLANK would vote for it himself; and that, at all events, we should suffer the law of 1832 to go into complete operation before we should make any alterations in its provisions.

There was no obligation on the part of Mr. CLAY to consult me on his bill; what he said to me I considered as a mere act of courtesy. The bill originated with himself, without any participation of the Committee on Manufactures, of which both he and I were members. The fact, however, that I was associated with him on that committee, led to a belief that I must have been acquainted with the provisions of the bill before it was matured, and subjected me to some unpleasant inquiries, as to this fact, in one of which, no doubt, I stated to you the conversation I had had with Mr. WEBSTER.

I regret extremely being called on to state conversations long past, with gentlemen whose recollections now, or understanding at the time, may not be precisely the same as my own; more especially as there was much misapprehension in the public papers as to the debates upon this bill.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant.

MAILON DICKERSON.

Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON, Washington, D. C.

Mr. B. said he had felt himself called on to write to Governor Dickerson, to know whether he had made any mistake in the statement he gave as to what had passed between them. He now presented Governor Dickerson's own words, by which it would be seen that the statement he had made was substantially correct.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that it was, of course, very well known that he differed with the Senator from Kentucky as to the propriety of passing the compromise act. He never complained, however, of any want of courtesy or kindness in the Senator for not consulting him on the subject. The truth was, that the Senator from Kentucky did communicate to him, some weeks before, that he had it in contemplation to bring forward an important measure, without saying what that measure was. He certainly did become acquainted with the measure before the Senator introduced it; but he could not say that he knew of it before the notice was given in the Senate. He was inclined to think that the conversation of which Governor Dickerson speaks, was about the time of the notice given of the intention of the Senator from Kentucky to introduce the bill. All he had at present to say was, that, differing as he did with the Senator from Kentucky, with regard to the measure spoken of, he made no complaint as to his not being consulted.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he did not know that it was a matter of the slightest consequence to the Senate or the public to be informed of the preliminary steps which led to the adoption of a great public measure; it was sufficient to say that it was submitted by himself, on his own responsibility; and, after a full discussion in the committee, in the Senate, and in the House of Representatives, was adopted by decisive majorities, and responded to by the nation with an enthusiasm almost unexampled. He was not responsible to any whether consultations were or were not held on the subject before its introduction to the Senate; it was sufficient for him to say that it was introduced, and passed in the manner he had mentioned.

Mr. C. said he came to this city from Ashland, in December, 1832. At that time there was an impression generally prevalent that the protective system was about to receive a fatal shock, and would be prostrated. Immediately after his arrival, he proceeded to Philadelphia, in company with a friend from Louisiana, since deceased. While there, the project of a compromise of this great and important question presented itself to his mind, and was the subject of reflection and consultation with that friend. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] passed through Philadelphia about that time, and the plan was communicated to him: it was true that the Senator expressed his disapprobation of it. A committee of very intelligent gentlemen interested in manufactures waited on him, (Mr. C.) to know what could be done to save them from the danger that was threatening them. To this committee he communicated his plan of settling this question, at least for a term of years, and it met their hearty concurrence and approval.

Upon his return to this city, he consulted the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] upon the subject, and he at first expressed his approbation of it; but after further consultation and reflection upon it his views were changed, and he voted against it. He thought it was prior to his introduction of the bill into the Senate, that he called a meeting of his political friends at his lodgings. There were some eight or ten present, and his impression was that the Senator from Massachusetts was there: certain he was that he was invited. The bill was read at this meeting, and its provisions discussed; and the fact that he (Mr. C.) had such a measure in contemplation was notorious in both Houses of Congress, and one or two motions were made by persons who had some glimpses of the plan, to anticipate its introduction. He regarded these particulars respecting the preliminaries to the introduction of the compromise act, except as matters of history, unimportant; the great and beneficial results that had followed its adoption was a sufficient excuse for its introduction.

With regard to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Dickerson,] whose letter has been read, he was upon such terms with him as to forbid a confidential intercourse between them. He knew that he was a warm friend of the manufacturing interest; but he was also a friend of the Administration; and he stood as many others who considered their devotion to the Administration paramount to their devotion to the highest interests of their country. It seems that, from his letter, he did mention the matter to him, and it might be so, but he had no recollection of having done so.

Mr. BENTON rose to say that he had no connection with this conversational debate, except in the single point of the accuracy of his statement of what had passed between Governor Dickerson and himself. He had read the letter for the single purpose of showing that he had committed no error in reporting the conversation of that gentleman. His object was accomplished by the reading of the letter itself; and he believed it was apparent that there was no mistake either in himself or in Governor Dickerson; and that the statement of the latter was very consistent with the remarks which the reading of the letter had called forth.

Mr. DAVIS well remembered the transactions of the period referred to, for he felt a very strong interest in what was going on. He was ready and willing to do the Senator from Kentucky all the justice he was entitled to, and could corroborate his statement except as to that part in which the Senator stated that he (Mr. D.) was at one time favorably disposed towards the compromise act, which was not so, as he had been opposed to it from first to last.

Mr. WEBSTER said that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] seemed to suppose that he (Mr. W.) was present at a consultation prior to the introduction of the bill in the Senate, or that he was invited to attend. The latter was very probable, but he had no recollection whatever of being present at any such consultation.

Mr. KNIGHT made a few observations, too inaudible to be understood, which terminated the discussion on the subject.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to prevent the interference of Federal officers in elections, as the special order of the day; when

Mr. WALL, who had the floor, addressed the Senate in an argumentative speech of great length, in reply to Mr. CRITTENDEN, and in opposition to the bill.

After the reception of some reports from the Executive Departments,

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 11, 1839.

Mr. EVANS remarked that, as this day was set apart for the business of the Territories, he asked leave to report a bill relating thereto.

Mr. CUSHMAN requested the gentleman to make his motion general for all the committees to be called on for reports. [Cries of "No! no!"]

Mr. EVANS then, no objection being made, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill for the improvement and survey of certain rivers, and the repair of certain roads, in the Territory of Florida.

Mr. CUSHMAN also asked leave to report a bill relative to Wisconsin.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that the committees be called on generally for reports.

Mr. CUSHMAN had no objection; but the motion having been put, was disagreed to.

Mr. CUSHMAN then, on leave, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to establish a port of entry at St. Joseph's, Florida.

Mr. HAYNES then rose and said that he would make one more, and he thought the last, effort to dispose of the President's annual message. He therefore asked leave to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of that document, with a view to bring it into the House and dispose of it.

Objection being made, Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules, demanding the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 87, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Banks, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Buchanan, Bynum, Chamberlain, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Crabb, Craig, Cushman, Davee, Elmore, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Gallup, Glascock, Grantland, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parrie, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikon, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Richardson, Rives, Sheffer, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vanderveer, Weeks, Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, John W. Allen, Bell, Bond, Briggs, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Chambers, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Davies, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Rice Garland, Giddings, William Graham, Grant, Halsted, Harlan, Hawes, Herod, Jabez Jackson, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, McKennan, Menefee, Mitchell, Naylor, Noyes, Peck, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Toland, Underwood, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, and Yorke—61.

Not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. WORD asked the House to take up an amendment of the Senate to the House bill relating to the district courts of the United States for the State of Mississippi; which was agreed to, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BRONSON moved the consideration of the special order, (territorial business,) remarking that, if the States were called through for resolutions, it would take up all day, and all the day be lost for the former.

Objection being made, Mr. B. moved to suspend that part of the order providing that resolutions should first be called; but the motion was disagreed to—yeas 83, noes 55—it requiring two thirds.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, suggested the propriety of first considering resolutions already on the Calendar.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. W. Very well, then; I shall not press it. Mr. DOWNING and Mr. MILLER asked leave to present petitions.

Mr. ADAMS objected to it, stating that he had some three hundred petitions in his possession waiting to be presented.

Mr. GRANT rose and asked leave to introduce a bill making appropriations for the continuation of the construction of certain harbors. Mr.

G. explained that he had drafted the bill without any new work, and confined its items rigidly to the estimates sent in by the proper Department.

Leave being granted,

Mr. G. brought in "A bill to provide for the construction of certain harbors, and the removal of obstructions at the mouths of certain rivers, for the year 1839;" which took the same reference as the foregoing.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for taking the census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; which was read twice, referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Resolutions were called for in order, commencing with the Territories, which will be given hereafter.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Henry Lucas and A. B. King, and the petitioners had leave to withdraw the same.

Mr. MARTIN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to purchase and distribute to the members and Delegates of this House who were not members at the last session, such books as were authorized to be purchased for the members of the Twenty-Fifth Congress by the resolution of January 29, 1838, and that he pay for the same out of the contingent fund.

Mr. M. said he believed that there were but six who would receive under the resolution.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, demanded the yeas and nays on that question; which the House refused to order.

Mr. BANKS said the House having refused to order the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, the only alternative left him to show his utter hostility to the whole system of legislation embraced in the resolution, was to move that the resolution lie on the table; and on that question he demanded the yeas and nays; which were not, however, ordered.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to take up the resolution offered by him on the 28th of January, in relation to the officers who have been acting as disbursing agents to the Indians, &c.

Objection being made,

Mr. R. moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; which, however, the House refused to agree to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to open the bar that is now forming at the mouths of the Red river and the Atchafalaya, and of removing the obstructions arising from the ledge of rocks opposite Alexandria, in Louisiana.

On motion of Mr. RIDGWAY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the propriety of reducing the number of United States land offices in the State of Ohio to the smallest number that they may deem consistent with the public interest.

Mr. BELL submitted the following resolution; which, on his motion, was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That of all monopolies, the most liable to abuse, the most oppressive and unreasonable, are Government monopolies; and none such ought to be upheld, but upon the clearest grounds of expediency and necessity.

2. Resolved, That the public post, with its present exclusive privileges, can only be sustained on principle, as an institution of Government, authorized by the Constitution, so long as it is necessary or essential to the operations of the Government in peace and in war, and no longer.

3. Resolved, That the exclusive right to carry letters for hire on all principal roads in the United States, claimed and asserted by the Federal Government, is a monopoly, exercised and tolerated at the commencement of the Government by reason of the low state of the public credit and finances, and not upon any ground of constitutional right or power.

4. Resolved, That a longer acquiescence in a monopoly, originally asserted upon such questionable grounds, is neither expedient nor justifiable under the present improved state of the public credit, and the increased resources of the country.

5. Resolved, That the business of carrying letters for hire, like every other branch of industry, connected with the prosperity and happiness of the country, should be thrown open to the enjoyment of all the citizens of the United States; that the public may hereafter realize the advantages of increased regularity, cheapness, security, and expedition, which are sure to follow from a free competition of private capital and enterprise in this as in all other pursuits.

6. Resolved, That in order to secure these great benefits, as well as to maintain correct principles in the administration of the Government, it is expedient that the less productive post routes, or such as offer no present inducement to private competition, should be sustained, if necessary, by appropriations out of the common Treasury, or revenues arising from other sources.

Mr. CARTER submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be instructed to inform this House whether land agents generally, or only particular land agents, resident in this city, be allowed the privilege of entering the different rooms of the General Land Office at all times, and remaining as many hours as they please, for the purpose of acquiring information useful to them in their business, and of examining the ground plats of public lands already in the market, and of new lands about to be brought into market, furnished by the surveyors general, together with their private reports as to the quality of the soil, nature of location, proximity to navigable waters and railroads, etc., and of making extracts and memoranda from the same; by which means the said agents have the power of ascertaining where the most valuable lands are located, and availing themselves of information improperly obtained; and also, whether the books and papers of the preemption and other bureaux of the office be accessible to them; whether the great seal of the office has lately been found in the possession of any one under suspicious circumstances; whether, since the reorganization of the General Land Office, quantities of patents have not been sent out in such vile and illegible handwriting as must tend to bring the office into discredit; whether any, and how many, since the reorganization of the Land Office, land patents have been returned to the Land Office for clerical inaccuracies, and whether there is not reason to suspect that great inaccuracies in the patents already sent out, as well as in those ready to be sent out, exist to a considerable extent; if so, the reason of this gross negligence on the part of those who have to attend to the duty of sending the patents out in a correct state; whether any clerks, and how many, since their appointment under the reorganization of the Land Office, have been allowed the privilege of staying away from the office for several months at a time, giving their names, the reasons for granting them these extraordinary privileges, stating who performs their duties in their absence; and if substitutes are allowed, who pays them, and the prices the substitutes receive as a remuneration for performing the duties of the absent clerks.

On motion of Mr. CROCKETT, it was

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be instructed to communicate to this House all the facts in relation to the existing contract for carrying the mail from Louisville, Kentucky, to New Orleans; when and to whom the contract was let, and all the terms and conditions of the same; whether all the terms and conditions of said contract have been complied with by the contractor, and if not, in what respect he has failed to perform his obligations; and what steps, if any, have been taken to enforce a compliance therewith.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, of Kentucky, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of passing a law giving compensation to Peters, Moore & Company, for carrying the mail in stages between Philadelphia and Lancaster, during the period that the passage upon the railroad was obstructed by a snow storm; and also into the expediency of making compensation to the said company for carrying the mail in stages on the turnpike road between Philadelphia and Lancaster; and also into the expediency of providing by law for returning to said company the sum of $840, retained out of the pay of said company by the Postmaster General, on account of the said company carrying a greater number of passengers on their mail routes, Nos. 1031 and 1058, than were permitted by their contracts.

On motion of Mr. POPE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the justice of the claim of John Hays, for thirty dollars, for work performed for the public during the last war, by order of an officer in the service of the United States, and that the committee report thereon.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the bill for the relief of James Bailey was recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PARMENTER asked leave to present the proceedings and resolutions of the Democratic portion of the Massachusetts Legislature on the subject of the Independent Treasury.

Objection being made, Mr. P. moved a suspension of the rules.

The rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. GRANT offered the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That bill No. 466, reported at the last session, providing for the construction of the Niagara ship canal, be made the special order of the day for Thursday, the 21st instant, after the expiration of the morning hour.

On motion of Mr. BICKNELL, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Wampsville, in the county of Madison, New York, by Lenax Furnace, to Cawasselan creek.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route between the post office called

Black Hawk, in Beaver county, Pennsylvania, to the post office in Clarkson, Columbiana county, Ohio, a distance of about ten miles, by the way of the village of North Beaver, formerly known by the name of Dillen's Mills, on Little Beaver, a place equidistant between the two points.

Mr. TOWNS offered the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to this House a copy of the correspondence between General Jesup and the Creek warriors, in relation to the negroes captured by them in the Seminole war; also, the correspondence between General Arbuckle, Colonel Armstrong, and Nathaniel Collins, with the War Department, on the subject of said negroes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House a statement showing the names of the commissioned officers of the regular Army that were absent from their command or post on the 1st of July and January last. Also, the amount paid during the year 1838 to officers of the Army for double rations, and to whom paid.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to obtain, and communicate to this House as early a day as practicable during the next session of Congress, information to the following effect: The prices at which muskets, rifles, and pistols might be made and delivered to the United States and private armories, if the same be located in any good and convenient position in the southern, the southwestern, and western sections of the Union; and that the said prices be obtained on the several suppositions that the permanency of the employment of such armories, the total number employed in those sections of the Union, their respective annual amounts of manufactures, and their system of proof and inspection of fire-arms, be each in all respects the same as do now appertain to the private armories employed by the Ordnance Department in the manufacture of small-arms.

On motion of Mr. C. SHEPARD, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing two buoys in the harbor of Beaufort, North Carolina, one on More's shoal and the other on Middle Ground shoal.

On motion of Mr. RENCHER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing commutation to the heirs of Richard D. Cook, for revolutionary services.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for refunding to applicants the fees they may have paid for a reissue or modification of their patents, when they shall have failed to obtain the same.

Mr. RIVES submitted the following resolution; which, under the rules, lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to cause to be prepared an abstract of the several petitions and memorials upon the subject of slavery, the abolition of slavery, the slave trade, and against the admission of any new State into the Union whose constitution may tolerate slavery, against the admission of Texas into the Union, and for the recognition of the independence of Hayti, which have been presented to this House since the commencement of the Twenty-Third Congress; stating each session separately, showing by whom presented, and the number of signers, men and women, where the same appears on the face of the papers.

On motion of Mr. COLES, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish to this House a tabular statement of the annual value of imports, payments into the Treasury on account of them, and the whole cost of their collection, with the rate per cent. on the value of imports, and also on the above named payments, from 1789 to 1837, inclusive, adding the whole expenditures of the Government for each year during the same period, exclusive of trust funds and public debt.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform this House what pay and emoluments are allowed to Lieutenant Wilkes and the officers under his command in the South Sea exploring expedition; and if any assurances have been given by the Department that the acting appointments now held by them will be confirmed on their return to the United States; and whether the expedition is considered as of a naval character or not.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Evansville, in the county of Preston, to Beverly, in the county of Randolph, in the State of Virginia.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing repairs to be made in the street leading from the City Hall towards the United States arsenal, within the city of Washington.

On leave given, Mr. THOMAS presented the memorial of sundry mechanics of this District, employed on the public buildings, in relation to a certain bill now before a committee of this House; which memorial, on motion of Mr. T., was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings, and was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. POTTER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be required to inquire into the various claims of Peters, Moore & Co., against the Post Office Department, which have been rejected by the Postmaster General, embracing three general items, and report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. AYCRIGG, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to report a bill providing that the estimated tonnage of vessels shall correspond with their actual capacity.

On motion of Mr. HALSTED, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any, and what, costs are charged against the United States, for printed copies of records of suits pending in the Supreme Court, which have been printed at the expense of the United States; and also, that they be instructed to inquire what amount is paid annually for printing the records and proceedings in suits pending before the Supreme Court, and to whom paid; and whether the clerk of that court charges suitors for copies of records of suits pending in the said court which are printed at the expense of the United States, and at what rate and by what rule the said charges are made; and whether any legislation is necessary in relation to the costs of suits in said court.

Mr. RANDOLPH submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies one day upon the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House tabular statements of the receipts and expenditures of the United States from the 4th of March, 1789, to the present time; showing the different sources from whence the revenue has been received in each year, and the different heads, and total amount of expenditures, and the balance in the Treasury, of each year; and also, the amount of appropriations under their respective heads, and the balance thereof unexpended, of each year, during the same period; and also, the amount of imports, and of foreign and domestic exports, and of American and foreign tonnage engaged therein, for each year, during the same period.

Mr. BEERS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, and Postmaster General, be severally requested to report to this House, as soon as practicable, the time that it will necessarily take to answer the various calls made by the House of Representatives on their respective Departments for information during its present session, together with the probable cost of making their respective reports in answer to said calls, including the printing of the same; also, that they severally report to this House the number of calls for information made on their respective Departments during the last session, by whom made, and the number of their respective reports made by virtue of the said calls, and what number have been acted upon by the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Clerk be requested to ascertain and report to this House, as soon as practicable, the cost for printing ordered during the present session, including the reprinting of twenty thousand copies of last year's document No. 297; also, at what time the printing now ordered will be completed.

Objection being made to its consideration at this time,

Mr. BEERS asked for a suspension of the rules for that purpose, and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 97, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Chaney, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Cray, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Ingham, Thomas B. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Word—79.

So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. MARVIN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for the survey of the bar and harbors of the following rivers and ports in Florida, with a view to the improvement of the same: The bar of the river St. Johns, and the river and harbor of St. Marks, and more especially the new and better channel recently discovered by Benjamin Thornton, Esq., of said Territory.

MATERIAL FOR THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. PRATT begged permission of the House to offer the resolution, which, at his solicitation, had been ordered to be printed on a former day. He said we have bills now before us for constructing a fire-proof War and General Post Office Department; and it was of the utmost importance that the resolution should be immediately considered. He said the interest, as well as the honor of the country, in his humble opinion, required that those buildings should be constructed of such material as would be permanent. He then referred to the comparative cheapness of granite and marble as a reason why they should give them the preference to sandstone, which is now being used in the construction of the Patent Office and Treasury Department. He conceived it to be their duty to use the best materials, more especially when they can be procured at a much less expense than the inferior. He hoped, at least, that the public mind might be called to the subject, whatever might be the disposition the House made of the resolution. He hoped, however, it would agree to consider it at the present time.

Objection being made to its consideration,

Mr. P. moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; which motion was agreed to.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Whereas, the materials used in the erection of the Treasury building in this city are conglomerated sandstone, absorbing water, and requiring to be frequently painted, at great expense, to preserve it against rain and frost: Therefore,

Resolved, as the sense of this House, That all public buildings hereafter to be erected for the use of the Government, shall be constructed of the hardest and most durable materials, either of marble or granite.

Mr. P. moved its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved, as instructions to the said committee, a proposition offered by him the other day as an amendment to the resolution; which proposition, having been then ordered to be printed, was now in the hands of the public printer, and the purport of which Mr. T. explained in the course of his remarks.

Mr. T. moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow, and proceeded to say (as he was understood) that this preamble contained certain things as to materials which had not, in the course of long experience, been found to be true. The preamble assumed that freestone required for its preservation frequent and constant painting. There were buildings erected of this material which had been built more than a hundred years, on which a paint brush had never fallen, and which were now as sound and unimpaired as they were the day they were built. He alluded particularly to the buildings of Governor Spotswood, of Virginia, and another; near which, according to the best of his recollection, a paint brush had never been, and which had sustained no manner of injury beyond, possibly, some little discoloration.

As to the laboratories which were now about to be built, (for such he designated these Departments,) he was astonished to find that gentlemen had become so magnificent in their ideas that nothing would suit them short of marble or granite. He would go along with any gentleman in every proper expenditure of the public money; for where was the necessity of building these Departments on the scale of palaces? If they were built of a material respectable in its appearance and enduring in its nature, the public should not expect anything beyond the outlay necessary to secure these two objects.

Now, his amendment provided, in substance, that all the public buildings which might hereafter be constructed in Washington should be built of the same material as the house in which they now were. The President's mansion, the Treasury building, the Patent Office, were all built of one material; and he asked that all future buildings might be similarly built, unless a cheaper and more stable material could be used. There was no better looking edifice in the country than this house, or the President's mansion, or than those now preparing for the Treasury Department and the Patent Office. He was opposed to all unnecessary expense; and, if this resolution was to go to the committee, he hoped that his amendment would be suffered to go along with it.

Mr. LINCOLN was opposed to the postponement, as calculated to prevent any definite action on the subject during the present session of Congress. It would be recollected that to-day and to-morrow had been specially set apart for the consideration of territorial business; and if the postponement took place as proposed, it might require a suspension of the rule to get at this subject; so that postponement till to-morrow might, in fact, be equivalent to postponement for the residue of the session. Already this morning a question involving, in some degree, the same subject-matter of inquiry, had been referred to the committee. Nothing, therefore, was to be gained by postponement.

As to the material, he thought he could satisfy the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TALIAFERRO] that a more wasteful expenditure of the public money had never been known in this Government than that in the purchase of the material for the public buildings, to say nothing of the shape or plan. It would cost the Government $60,000 more for the construction of a building of such material than if constructed of another. What was this conglomerated sandstone? There were now, in buildings constructed of that stone, masses of rude clay; the water had got in, which, with the expansion of frost, had riven asunder some of the parts. A portion might be perforated by a fine stick, and it was necessary for the workmen to take it out. It was very unsafe and insecure; and, instead of giving fifty-seven cents a foot for this conglomerated sandstone, granite might be obtained at forty cents. At this very moment there was an application before the Committee on Public Buildings for an appropriation of $12,000 to paint the very structure now in the course of erection. Twenty thousand dollars had been expended in five years for that object. The stone was such an absorbent of water that the building could not be secure unless it was painted. As to the appearance, he cared little about it, whether painted or not; but he looked to the extravagant waste of the public money. By using another material, more than thirty-six per cent. would be saved upon the cost, besides the expense of painting every three years.

He thought the subject should go to the committee, whose duty it would be to report all the facts—what was the cheapest and best material of which to construct these buildings.

Mr. BRONSON inquired what would be the effect of the previous question?

The SPEAKER said it would be to bring the House to a vote on the resolution.

Mr. BRONSON said he would not then move it, but would move to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. THOMAS suggested that a memorial had this morning been referred to the Committee on Public Buildings of the same purport as this resolution. The power of the committee, therefore, would be neither increased nor diminished by the reference of this resolution.

Mr. BRONSON withdrew his motion to lay on the table at the request of Mr. TALIAFERRO, who said he could not well perceive how the House could get into a debate on a matter of this kind. The proposition was a very simple one; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] was correct in his statement of facts, there could be no further question. If granite could be furnished cheaper than any other material, then he (Mr. T.) was for granite. But what did all the estimates of the mechanics say, when the Treasury building and the Patent Office were about to be constructed? The whole estimates showed that the expense of building with granite would be more than double. He was willing to make issue with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and if the gentleman would permit the resolution to pass with the modification which he (Mr. T.) would suggest, namely that the cheapest plan should be adopted, there would be an end of the matter.

Mr. PRATT said he would accept the modification. He was one of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and conceived it his duty to bring the matter before the House. His sense of duty to the public interest dictated such a course to him; as he had no disposition to debate this matter further, and to save the time of the House, he would accept the modification. He had the certificate of the Commissioner of Public Buildings that granite was seventeen cents less per foot than freestone.

Mr. TALIAFERRO said he should know something of this matter. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] ever see a precious metal without dross? The fault was in the construction, and not in the material, if any flaws had been found, as the gentleman described.

Mr. LINCOLN was understood to say he would state that, as to one of the columns of the President's House, a part of it had come asunder, and that it had been necessary to supply its place, in consequence of the operation of the frost; and that, as to other columns now finished in the new building, there were various places in which the material had decayed from three to five inches.

Mr. TALIAFERRO said there was a perfect as well as an imperfect formation of marble. So it was with the freestone which the gentleman (in ridicule, he supposed,) had denominated sandstone. But he (Mr. T.) insisted that the architect was bound to look and see that it was perfect.

There was a great mistake here if gentlemen supposed that paint was necessary for the preservation or the comfort of edifices built of freestone. He spoke from experience. It was not necessary, although it might improve the appearance. That was a matter of taste.

The appropriate points for the House to consider were usefulness and economy.

Mr. NAYLOR said he would not occupy the time of the House; but he had been about to ask leave of the House to introduce a resolution on this subject. He held in his hand one which he thought would suit the views of all.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, understanding Mr. PRATT to have accepted his modification, withdrew the motion to postpone.

And the question recurring on commitment, Mr. NAYLOR said that the House was aware that, within a few days, the Committee on Public Buildings had submitted estimates for a General Post Office building, to be constructed of split granite. He had been informed, by those competent to judge, that the building could be constructed better, and at much less cost, of marble.

Mr. N. then offered a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from New York, and expressed a hope that it would not be objected to.

Mr. LINCOLN apprehended that the inquiry proposed would cause delay on the action of the bill for the construction of a Post Office building. He was opposed to delay; and all difficulty might be obviated by referring the question of material to the President.

Mr. HAYNES said if he understood the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NAYLOR,] he was in favor of its adoption. It was certainly important, when we were about to erect public buildings to last as long as materials can last, to have estimates from a competent source of the cost and durability of such materials. He was, therefore, in favor of the proposed amendment. But he would say a word of the course of the Committee on Public Buildings. "A change had come over the spirit of their dream" since the last session of Congress. Then we heard nothing but the cry of economy, when we were urged to pull down the new Treasury building, and remove its materials to the site for a General Post Office, and, perchance, when that building should be partially constructed, to pull it down, and carry back the material to its original place. Now that committee goes for the more expensive materials of granite or marble.

Mr. GRANT moved the previous question, but withdrew it, and moved to lay the subject on the table; which motion was rejected.

Mr. PRATT then modified his resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having the public buildings hereafter to be erected built of either marble or granite, instead of the stone that has been used; and that said committee report to this House which of these materials is the most desirable and economical, and the several prices at which each of said materials can be furnished.

Mr. P. demanded the previous question; which was seconded.

And the main question (being on the adoption of the resolution) was ordered, and taken; and the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. SLADE offered the following resolution:

Whereas, on the 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1839, there were driven by the doors of the Capitol of the United States in view of members of both Houses of Congress, thirty men chained and handcuffed, together with twenty women and children; and whereas there are circumstances which justify a strong suspicion that it was for no offense against the laws of the United States, or of any of the States, that said men, women, and children were chained, handcuffed, and driven as aforesaid: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of seven members of the House be forthwith appointed to inquire and report—

1. The authority under which the said men, women, and children were thus chained, handcuffed, and driven as aforesaid;

2. Whether they were charged with the commission of crimes; and if so, of what crimes, and when and where committed;

3. Whether they had been convicted of crimes, and if so, of what crimes, and by what tribunal convicted; and

4. Whether the persons who chained, handcuffed, and drove the said men, women, and children were officers of the United States, duly authorized to have the custody of criminals within the District of Columbia; and, if so, whether they committed said men, women, and children to the common jail of said District for trial, or to the penitentiary thereof for punishment.

Resolved, That said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to report to this House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STANLY inquired of the Chair if the resolution was received?

The SPEAKER said it was.

Objection being made,

Mr. CRABB inquired of the Chair whether the resolution would not be laid on the table, under the resolution of the 12th December?

The SPEAKER said he would decide that point when it came up in its proper place.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the erection of a fort or other military works on Bartlett Point, in the river St. Lawrence, in the county of Jefferson, and State of New York.

Mr. FILLMORE, on leave, presented to the House several petitions; which were appropriately referred.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the 20th rule of this House, which provides that "all the States and Territories" shall be called for resolutions on each alternate Monday, during each session of Congress, be suspended, after this day, during the remainder of the session.

On motion of Mr. DE GRAFF, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of passing a bill providing for the settlement of the accounts of the late purser Melancton W. Bostwick, and other officers and men who were lost in the year 1815, on board the brig-of-war Epervier, which was foundered at sea.

Mr. TITUS submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies one day upon the table:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution of this House, of the 14th January, instructing said committee to inquire into the expediency of an explanatory act in relation to the laws imposing duties on imports; and, also, from the further consideration of a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the same day, upon the same subject; and that the said resolution and communication be referred to a select committee.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, it was

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of this House of the 14th January, as requires the Secretary of War to transmit to this House any part of the proceedings of the commissioners under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830 with the Cherokee Indians, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to this House a statement of the annual expenditures for each revenue cutter, consisting of repairs, equipments, rations, officers and seamen's wages, and other incidental expenses, for the year 1830 to 1838.

On motion of Mr. TILLINGHAST, it was

Resolved, That Caleb Williams, Jr., and S. W. Hart, praying by petition for the remission of certain duties, have leave to withdraw said petitions and the papers filed therewith.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the House took up for consideration the following preamble and resolution submitted by him on 31st December:

Whereas, in the message of the President of the United States, at the opening of the Eighteenth Congress, it was, among other things, avowed and proclaimed as the settled national policy of the United States, that "in the wars of the European Powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do;" that, "with the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected;" that "we owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety;" that, "with the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power, we have not interfered, and shall not interfere; but with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European Power, or in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States;" and that "it is impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference."

Resolved, therefore, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if the same be not, in his judgment, incompatible with the public interest, what explanations the King of the French has rendered to the United States in relation to the recent blockade of a part of the coast of the Mexican Republic by France; the treatment of vessels of the United States, public or private, by the blockading squadron; the reduction of the castle of San Juan de Ulloa; and the ulterior views and designs of the French Government respecting the Mexican Republic. Also, to inform the House whether he has proffered to either of the contending parties the mediation of the United States in the premises, and to communicate any correspondence on the subjects aforesaid which may have passed between the Government of the United States and that of France. And that the President be in like manner requested to communicate to the House information of the same tenor in regard to the blockade of the Rio de la Plata by the French, and the differences existing between the French Government and that of the Argentine Republic.

The resolution was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to transmit to this House a copy of a communication from Commodore Jesse D. Elliott to the late Secretary of the Navy, which accompanied the Commodore's transmission of the proceedings of the said court-martial against Lieutenant C. J. Hunter, together with the deposition of the Governor of Minorca in relation to the transactions involved in the subject before said court. Also, that he lay before this House copies of all communications and papers furnished to the Department by Commodore Elliott in explanation of, or having reference to, the complaint of Passed Midshipman Barton against the Commodore, a copy of which was called for by a resolution of this House of the 1st February instant; and also of all communications on file in the Department in relation to the presentation of a service of plate to Commodore Elliott by the crew of the American frigate Constitution, during the last cruise of the said ship under his command.

Mr. ANDREWS submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy communicate to this House the names of all the Navy officers who have been waiting orders on furlough, or otherwise off duty, for more than six months past, with the length of time they have been so off duty, the amount of pay each has received, and whether any officer of the Navy receives a pension for disability, at the same time he is receiving pay as an officer, with the names and amount in each case.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire upon what terms the Indian portraits, taken by George Catlin, of distinguished chiefs and braves, belonging to about forty different nations, together with the costumes, other curiosities, and sketches of the country, collected and taken by the said Catlin, during seven years' residence with and among the different tribes of western Indians, can be obtained by the Government, and into the expediency of purchasing the same.

On motion of Mr. REED, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing for a survey of a dangerous shoal called Nantucket South shoal, situated in the ocean, twenty or thirty miles from land, and greatly retarding and obstructing the navigation between the Northern and Middle and Southern States, and also between the United States and Europe. Also, that they inquire into the expediency of providing buoys for the harbor of Weyfleet and vicinity.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for a survey of the Conassett Rocks in Massachusetts bay, with a view to the erection of a light house thereon.

On motion of Mr. BORDEN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending a post route to the village of Westport Point, in the town of Westport, Massachusetts.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the rules and orders for conducting the business in the House of Representatives be so amended, that in the proviso of the 18th rule the word "thirty" be struck out, and the word "sixty" inserted in its place; and that in the last line but one of the said proviso the word "day" be struck out, and the words "and fourth day" be inserted in its place.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, BY BLAIR & RIVES.

25TH CONGRESS, 3D SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1839.

VOL. 7. . . No. 12.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of New Hampshire, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Volney French and others, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who have the subject of said petition under consideration.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, it was

Resolved, That the report of the Committee of Claims in the case of Betty H. Beard be recommitted to that committee, for the purpose of examining additional testimony.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the select committee to which had been referred the memorial of Duncan N. Hennen, complaining of the official conduct of Philip K. Lawrence, judge of the eastern and western districts of Louisiana, made the following report:

The select committee to which was referred the memorial of Duncan N. Hennen, complaining of the official conduct of Philip K. Lawrence, judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern and western districts of Louisiana, report:

That, in consequence of the evidence collected by them, in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, and which is hereto subjoined, they are of opinion that Philip K. Lawrence, judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern and western districts of Louisiana, be impeached for high misdemeanors in office.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House how the armies and troops engaged in prosecuting the Florida war have been furnished with supplies of flour, meal, corn, oats, hay, bacon, pork, and beef for the last two years, stating whether the supplies have been furnished by contract, in whole or in part, and the name or names of the contractors, and whether the contracts have been let to the lowest bidder, or whether the supplies have been furnished, in whole or in part, by an agent or agents employed to make purchase; and if so, the name or names of the agents, and the sums allowed them as compensation for their services respectively, and whether the compensation by a gross sum, by the month or year, or a percentage upon the amount of their purchases; and if a percentage, its amount.

Resolved further, That said Secretary inform the House what is the highest price paid by the Government during the last two years for flour by the barrel; meal, corn, and oats by the bushel; and bacon, pork, and beef by the pound or barrel; and hay by the one hundred pounds or ton, delivered in the ports of Florida.

Mr. U. (leave having been denied) moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of considering the resolutions at this time; which motion was rejected.

Mr. DUNCAN submitted the following resolution; which, under the rule, lies one day on the table.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to make out a statement of the sums of money which have been paid as the expenses of the committee of investigation, appointed by the House of Representatives during the session of 1836-37, of which the Hon. HENRY A. WISE was chairman; and also, the committee of investigation of the same session, of which the Hon. JAMES GARLAND was chairman, stating particularly the items of said expenses, and to whom the same were paid, and report the same to the House.

The States having been called through for resolutions, the special order was taken up, being the consideration of

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, all the bills were referred to the same Committee of the Whole, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVEE in the chair.)

On motion of Mr. B. the committee took up the bills in the following order:

A bill to define and establish the eastern boundary of the Territory of Iowa; which was considered and laid aside to be reported to the House.

A bill to authorize the election or appointment of certain officers of the Territory of Iowa, and for other purposes; which was also laid aside.

A bill to provide for the erection of public buildings in the Territory of Florida.

After some remarks from Messrs. BOND, DOWNING, and BRONSON,

Mr. BOND submitted a proviso that the passage of this law should not be held as binding the United States to any future appropriation; which was agreed to, and the bill and amendment ordered to be reported.

The committee then took up the bill to authorize the election or appointment of certain officers in the Territory of Iowa, and for other purposes; which was considered and laid aside.

The next was the bill to amend the act establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin, (limiting the tenure of the offices of Governor, secretary, marshal, and attorney to two years, judges to four, &c.)

Mr. ADAMS inquired the object of the proposed change.

Mr. DOTY explained that it was to hold to a greater and more frequent accountability, and to assimilate the periods of service to those of similar officers in the States.

Mr. ADAMS insisted that its effect would be to render the Governors more dependent on Executive power and influence. Mr. A. moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. BRONSON disclaimed any such intention on the part of the committee who reported the bill, and the inference was rather the reverse, or at least to bring about a more direct responsibility to the people among whom the officers resided.

Mr. POPE was unwilling to make any change in a system which had hitherto worked well enough, and no complaints had yet been heard of the Governor of Wisconsin.

Mr. BRONSON could assure the committee that no intention existed to reach the existing Governor of Wisconsin, for the bill was so drafted as to take effect only on the expiration of Governor Dodge's term.

Mr. DOTY defended the provisions of the bill with much earnestness, and showed the necessity of a change and a more frequent removal from the negligence of some of the officers.

The amendment was disagreed to, and the bill was laid aside.

The next was the bill to provide for the building of a pier on Lake Winnebago; which was considered and laid aside.

The bill making St. Joseph's, Florida, a port of entry, was also considered and ordered to be reported.

The bill for the relief of the Brotherton Indians, in the Territory of Wisconsin, was next considered and ordered to be reported.

The bill to fix the salaries of the keepers of the public archives in Florida.

After a brief discussion between Messrs. BOND and DOWNING,

Mr. BOND moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; which was lost.

Mr. B. moved to strike out "$750" and insert "$500" as the salary to be given.

Mr. BRONSON remarked that that was the present salary.

The amendment was disagreed to; and the bill laid aside to be reported.

The bill to authorize the purchase of a law library for the Territory of Florida was next considered.

The bill to authorize the construction of a road from Dubuque, in Iowa, to the boundary of Missouri.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired if his colleague had made an estimate of the amount of money involved in these bills?

Mr. BRONSON had not yet; but would by tomorrow morning. The amounts, however, were in all cases small.

Mr. MERCER moved an additional section, containing several items for works of internal improvements, both in the Territory and in some of the States; which was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside; and the committee took up the "bill to authorize the construction of certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin;" which was considered and agreed to.

The bill reported this morning by Mr. EVANS, to provide for certain improvements in Florida, was next considered.

The bill to grant land to certain counties in Iowa for the construction of public buildings, was also ordered to be reported.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the committee took up the bill to authorize the importation, free of duty, of the iron materials of certain iron vessels; and, after some discussion between Messrs. KEMBLE, EVANS, NAYLOR, and ADAMS, The CHAIRMAN decided that the bill did not fall within the special order.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from that decision, on the ground that a portion of it had reference to the Territory of Florida—the second section.

After a few further remarks from Messrs. DOWNING, LINCOLN, EVANS, BRONSON, and CAMBRELENG, the bill was laid aside, to have the question decided in the House.

The committee then took up the "bill in relation to the town of Southport, Wisconsin."

The question was on the substitute submitted by Mr. DOTY, on Saturday last, which he now moved.

Mr. LINCOLN opposed the bill, and also the substitute, and moved that the bill be laid aside, not to be reported.

Mr. DOTY earnestly advocated the bill, citing various acts of legislation by which Congress had absolutely donated the proceeds of the sales of town lots to the inhabitants thereof; whereas this bill only provided that the money should be paid into the Treasury, and laid out in the construction of the harbor of Southport, leaving the selection of the point, too, to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

After some further remarks from Messrs. MERCER, DOTY, and LINCOLN,

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the committee rose, and reported the bills passed in committee to the House, and progress on the others.

Mr. ADAMS made an inquiry as to the bill ruled out of order by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER remarked that it was not usual for the House to entertain questions of order before committees, the latter deciding their own points. He suggested that the question could be settled in committee to-morrow.

DESTRUCTION OF THE CAROLINE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message of the President of the United States in relation to the demands made on the British Government for satisfaction for the destruction of the Caroline, at Schlosser, in the United States;

Mr. BRONSON moved to print ten thousand extra copies; which motion, being then objected to, lies over.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 12, 1839.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do not pass:

An act for the relief of Dr. Francis Lambert; and An act for the relief of Sylvester Phelps and others.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported an act for the relief of Joseph Jackson, without amendment, and recommending its passage.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying that the title of the Menomonee Indians to lands within that Territory may be extinguished, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. S., from the same committee, to which the bill for the relief of Milley Yates was recommitted, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation in favor of its passage.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Michael Fenwick, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SWIFT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the act providing for paying three companies of militia in the State of Indiana called into the service of the United States, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of Walter Jones against the United States; and

A bill to amend the act of March 3, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States," and for other purposes.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to alter the time for holding the fall term of the circuit court of the United States for the District of Michigan, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred an act for the relief of Peyton Randolph, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do not pass:

An act for the relief of John England;
An act for the relief of Samuel Hapten;
An act for the relief of John Jacob Baugh;
An act for the relief of Oliver Peck;
An act for the relief of Elizabeth Durant;
An act for the relief of the widow of Captain James Hunter;

An act for the relief of Fielding Pratt; and An act for the relief of Elizabeth Jones and others.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read a first and second time and referred to appropriate committees:

An act for the relief of Griffith Coombe and John P. Ingle, trustees of the house in the city of Washington called the brick Capitol;

An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise claims of the United States against certain banks.

An act for the relief of Cornelius Taylor;
An act for the relief of Jamison & Williams;
An act for the relief of James H. Grant, Moses W. Simpson, and Thruston Going; and

A joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to present a gold medal to James Rumsey.

PETITION.

Mr. RIVES presented the petition of Sarah M. Gates, widow of Captain Lemuel Gates, and the petition of Jeremiah Fugitt, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RESOLUTION SUBMITTED.

Mr. ALLEN, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a joint resolution to authorize the Treasurer of the United States to issue certificates of deposit in lieu of others to be canceled; which was read twice, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. TALLMADGE, was taken up, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General communicate to the Senate the number of removals of deputy postmasters since March 4, 1837, the names of the persons so removed, and the times when removed, the names of the persons appointed to fill the vacancies, the names of the offices where such removals have been made, classifying the whole by States and Territories.

The following resolution, also submitted yesterday by Mr. TALLMADGE, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the Senate copies of all proposals for furnishing supplies to the Indian department, and of all contracts entered into for the same, since the 1st of May last, and of all correspondence with the department in relation to said proposals and contracts; and whether any mode of procuring supplies has been adopted, other than by advertising for proposals, and giving the contract to those offering the most favorable terms.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the resolution was amended by adding thereto the following words:

And that he also inform the Senate what has been the result of the late attempts to revive the mode of supplying the Indians with goods by contract, and how far the goods obtained by such contracts have been at fair prices, good quality, and suitable kind; and that all information in possession of the department, or in its power to obtain without delay, bearing on the price, quality, and fitness of the goods so obtained by contract, be communicated to the Senate; and also the comparative view of said contracts with the purchases of Indian goods previously made by the agents and officers of the United States.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution; which lies over:

Resolved, That the daily hour of the meeting of the Senate shall be at eleven o'clock until otherwise ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate if any, and what, banks in Illinois, since their resumption of specie payment in May last, have applied to be made banks of deposit; and if any, the reasons why not so made.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to prevent the interference of Federal officers in elections, and the special order of the day; when

Mr. RIVES addressed the Senate at length, and with much earnestness, against the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, in concluding, stated his great disapprobation of the doctrines contained in the report of the Judiciary Committee, and said that the Senate owed it to itself to revoke the sanction it had given to it by printing an extra number of copies of it. With this view, he submitted a set of resolutions condemnatory of the report, and concluding with an amendment to it. He submitted to his friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] whether they could not both accomplish the object they had in view by adopting these resolutions in lieu of the bill about which many gentlemen entertained constitutional scruples.

Mr. R. then read the resolutions, and moved they be printed.

Mr. PIERCE desired to know in what character the gentleman's resolutions were offered; whether they were moved as an independent proposition, or as an amendment to the bill. If the former, it was clearly not in order to receive them.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that it was always best to do one thing at a time. The issue had been fairly made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] on his bill as introduced, and he intended, for one, at some convenient time, to give his sentiments with regard to it. Though he was disposed, on all occasions, to show every courtesy to his fellow members of the Senate, yet he was not disposed to permit the issue to be changed at this time. The honorable Senator from Virginia could, at the proper time to-morrow, bring forward his resolutions and have the sense of the Senate on them, and he should be very ready to consider them; but on this question he wanted the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill.

Mr. WALL complained of the unfair manner in which the Senator from Virginia had treated the report. It was plain to every man of common sense in the community that no such inference could be drawn from it as the one drawn by the Senator from Virginia. The committee, (Mr. W. said,) in this report, was discussing the rights of citizens; and the Senator would not pretend to deny that officeholders were citizens? He begged leave to tell the Senator from Virginia that whatever new lights he might now have, that the distinction he had made was not to be found in the Constitution. What, sir! (said Mr. W.,) are the officers of this Government a distinct and separate class from the people? Are those whom the people have intrusted with the transaction of their business, aliens to them? Was this the Democracy that the Senator had lately acquired? Mr. W. objected to having these resolutions at all connected with the report; and he considered that by so doing, it would be placing an unfair construction upon it.

Mr. KING was much surprised that the Senator from Virginia should think of introducing these resolutions in connection with the report. The report (Mr. K. said) was not before the Senate, and could in no way be subject to amendment. It was an answer to a bill, which bill was now before the Senate in Committee of the Whole, and that, and that alone, was subject to amendment. With the same propriety might the Senator propose to amend the speech of the Senator from New Jersey, as to propose an amendment to the report. All parliamentary law was against it. If the gentleman would bring forward his resolutions in a proper manner, and at a proper time, he would cheerfully give them every necessary consideration. But he hoped they would go on with the bill, unconnected with any matter foreign to it, and dispose of it as early as practicable, for he apprehended that the business of the country might suffer by a protracted discussion.

Mr. RIVES asked of the Senator from Alabama, who was so well versed in parliamentary law, of which he professed to have but little knowledge, if it was not in his power to move to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. KING said certainly the Senator could make that motion.

Mr. RIVES said his object was to get his resolutions printed and before the Senate, and to have them adopted as an antidote to the report. He cared not how this was done, whether by a recommitment or otherwise. With regard to his Democracy, it was not as new as that of the Senator from New Jersey, which, as he understood, went back only to 1812, while his he could trace back to 1798. He thought the gentleman ought to have followed him step by step in his argument commenting on this report, instead of complaining of the inferences drawn in one portion of it.

Mr. CUTHBERT asked if he was to understand of the gentleman from Virginia that he proposes to recommit the bill with the report of the Judiciary Committee, for the purpose of having these resolutions reported distinct, without the bill?

Mr. RIVES replied in the affirmative.

Mr. CUTHBERT rejoined, that the gentleman then shrunk from the defense of the bill. A bill (he said) had been introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] of a character which provoked the severest censures in this report. The gentleman, therefore, justified the report when he shrunk from the defense of the bill.

Mr. RIVES said he did not undertake to decide the question as to the bill in its present shape. He proposed to recommit it with instructions to introduce these resolutions, and also to make a report on the bill; so that he did not give up the principle contained in it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN was understood to say that he preferred that the bill should not be recommitment at this time. He wished the argument to go on, though he believed the Senator had an undoubted right to move its recommitment.

Mr. RIVES observed that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] admitted that he had the right to move to recommit the bill, with instructions to bring in these resolutions.

Mr. KING said he admitted no such thing. He admitted neither more nor less than that it was in the power of the Senator to move to recommit the bill with instructions to amend the bill itself, and if the Senate chose to make the instructions positive, it could do it. But all parliamentary rules showed that the Senator could not move to recommit the bill, with instructions to amend the report of the committee that had been made on it, or to bring in a string of resolutions having the same object.

Mr. RIVES observed that the Senate would see his object, and he was indifferent how it was obtained; all he wanted was to have the resolutions printed, so as to have them before the Senate, and to allow him to consider in what way he could best obtain the object he had in view in drafting them.

The VICE PRESIDENT said the Senator could not introduce his resolutions while the subject under discussion yet remained undisposed of.

Mr. NORVELL observed that he desired to address the Senate on the subject of the bill, but as it was too late in the day for that object, and yet too early to adjourn, he would propose that the bill be passed over informally, and that they proceed to the consideration of the general orders.

This was agreed to.

Mr. RIVES then submitted the following resolutions, and moved that they be printed; which was adopted:

Whereas, "the constitutional remedy by the elective principle becomes nothing if it may be smothered by the enormous patronage of the General Government;" and whereas, also, "freedom of election is essential to the mutual independence of the State and Federal Governments, and of the different branches of the same Government so vitally cherished by American institutions;" Therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, it is highly "improper for officers, depending on the Executive of the Union, to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right."

Resolved, also, That measures ought to be adopted by Congress, so far as their constitutional powers may extend, to restrain, by law, all interference of Federal officers with elections, otherwise than by giving their own votes; and that the report of the Judiciary Committee be committed to a select committee, with instructions to new model it according to the principles declared in the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 12, 1839.

Mr. C. SHEPARD, on leave, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill making provision for the purchase and repair of court-houses in Florida.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, on leave, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1839.

Also, Senate bill, without amendment, to allow a drawback of duties on imported hemp, when manufactured into cordage, and exported.

Mr. C. also reported a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the condition of the Treasury to be such that certain payments could not be made without the immediate passage of the "bill to amend an act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes to meet the current expenses of Government, approved May 21, 1838."

The letter having been read at the Clerk's table, Mr. C. said this bill had been reported on the 8th of January, and was on its engrossment on the Speaker's table. Mr. C. now asked the House to take it up. He added, as a reason for the motion, that the House would perceive, from the reading of the letter, that it was not in the power of the Treasury to meet the drafts upon it, unless this bill, which was merely to extend this act from January to May, was passed.

Mr. BRONSON begged his colleague not to press that motion that day, to the hindrance of territorial business, but postpone his motion till to-morrow: One day would make but little difference.

Mr. CAMBRELENG could not withdraw the motion.

Mr. BELL hoped the gentleman would not press it now, but have the communication printed, so that they might have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG yielded; and, on his motion, Mr. Woodbury's letter was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERS suggested to set aside the special order for the morning hour, to call the committees for reports, but it was objected to.

The House then resumed the execution of the special order.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

The following bills reported yesterday, without amendment, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

A bill to establish the boundary line of the Territory of Iowa;

A bill for the election or appointment of officers in the Territory of Iowa;

A bill to amend the organic law of Iowa and Wisconsin;

A bill to amend the act establishing the Territorial Government of Wisconsin;

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved to strike out the provision in relation to the tenure of office of the officers; which, after some discussion between Mr. G. and Mr. BRONSON, was disagreed to.

A bill making an appropriation for the building of piers at the northern extremity of Winnebago lake;

A bill to establish a port of entry at the St. Joseph's bay, in Florida;

A bill for the relief of the Brotherton Indians, in Wisconsin;

A bill to fix the salary of the keepers of public archives in Florida;

A bill making appropriation for the purchase of a law library for the use of the Board of Commissioners in Florida;

A bill for the survey of certain rivers and roads in Florida;

A bill granting to the counties of Lee, Des Moines, Jackson, and Dubuque, land to aid in erecting public buildings;

A bill for the erection of a state-house in Florida; and

A bill to authorize the construction of a road from Dubuque to some point in Missouri.

The bill to provide for certain internal improvements in Iowa was taken up, the question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in certain amendments.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, caused the following one among them to be read. It had been moved yesterday by Mr. MERCER:

For the survey and estimate of the cost of constructing a harbor on Lake Michigan contiguous to Indiana City, at the mouth of the Grand Calumet river, $500.

Mr. G. begged leave to inquire where "Indiana City" was?

Mr. MERCER said that Iowa was as much interested in the improvements of Lake Michigan as Wisconsin, or any of the coterminous States.

Mr. GARLAND. But where is "Indiana City"?

Mr. CHAPMAN, of Iowa, said there was no such place, nor a Calumet river, in that Territory.

After a somewhat confused discussion as to where this "paper city" was not, it came out that it was in the State of Indiana, at or near the extreme head, or south bend, of Lake Michigan.

Mr. GARLAND thereupon moved to strike it out, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The amendment was further discussed at some length; when, by general consent, the call for the yeas and nays was withdrawn, and the amendment unanimously rejected. The other amendments were concurred in.

The bill to authorize the construction of certain improvements in Wisconsin.

All the foregoing were ordered to be read the third time this day.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, the House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PICKENS in the chair.)

The following bills were considered and ordered to be reported, unless where otherwise stated:

A bill making a donation of land for the erection of public buildings in Iowa;

A bill making an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital in the city of St. Joseph, Florida;

Mr. DOWNING moved to fill up the two blanks, one with $15,000 for the building, and the other with $1,000 for buoys.

After a few words from Mr. PETRIKIN, the first motion was agreed to.

Mr. CUSHMAN remarked that, as buoys for this point were provided for in another bill, he thought $500 quite sufficient.

Mr. DOWNING assented; and, so modified, the motion was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company was then called up by Mr. BRONSON.

Mr. LINCOLN raised the question of order that this bill, not being strictly a territorial one, did not fall within the special order.

The CHAIRMAN sustained this position.

Mr. CHAPMAN took an appeal from that decision; and after some discussion, in which the decision was sustained by Mr. LINCOLN, and opposed by Messrs. BRONSON, SHIELDS, DOWNING, CHAPMAN, NAYLOR, and TILLINGHAST, when, upon twice taking the question, once by tellers, no quorum voted, the committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House; which was ordered—ayes 71, noes 55; and a quorum being found present, after a name or two had been called,

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, it was dispensed with.

The question was then taken on the decision of the Chair; and it was affirmed by the committee—ayes 84, noes 45.

So the bill was ruled out of order.

The next bill considered was a "bill to establish a system of internal improvement in Wisconsin."

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, for the reason that he was convinced Congress could not authorize a Territory to do that which it had not the power of doing itself.

The bill was opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, UNDERWOOD, TOUCEY, CAMBRELENG, EVERETT, EWING, and HAYNES, and supported by Messrs. BELL, BRONSON, PRENTISS of Mississippi, DOTY, CRARY, MERCER, and HAMER; when

Mr. EVERETT said if the friends of the bill would accept an amendment providing that no loan should be made until authorized by a previous law of the Legislature, he would withdraw his opposition.

Mr. BRONSON said he had not the slightest objection.

The proviso was agreed to; and on taking the question on Mr. PETRIKIN's motion, the vote was ayes 59, noes 54, (no quorum); but upon a count a quorum being found present, the motion was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside.

A bill making provision for a court-house in Florida.

A bill granting to the judges of the supreme court of Iowa the same compensation as, by law, is given to the judges of the supreme court of Wisconsin.

The bill to approve and confirm an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes.

On the above being ordered to be reported, the committee resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the town of Southport, on Lake Michigan; but, by consent, the bill was left in committee.

The committee then rose and reported; and the bills without amendment were ordered to a third reading to-day.

All the bills ordered this morning to be engrossed, were then read the third time and passed.

The bill making an appropriation for the purchase of a law library for the use of the Legislature and Judiciary of Florida, coming up on its passage—

Mr. HALSTED moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Territories, with instructions to reduce the amount of $5,000 to $1,000.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; whereupon the former gentleman withdrew his motion, and Mr. C.'s was put and disagreed to.

Mr. HALSTED then demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which, being ordered, were—yeas 61, nays 64.

So the bill was rejected.

Subsequently, Mr. EDWARDS moved a reconsideration of this vote; and before the question was taken,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 13, 1839.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying for a grant of land to be employed in the cultivation of the morus multicaulis; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the petition of the officers and crew of the revenue cutter Vigilance, praying a participation in the benefits of the Navy pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MOUTON presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, in relation to the improvement of the navigation of the Atchafalaya and Red rivers; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FELTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act for the relief of Henry L. Reviere;

An act for the relief of William Washington Bigham;

An act for the relief of James Cooper;

An act for the relief of John and Samuel Rowe;

An act for the relief of Zebulon Sheets;

An act for the relief of George Rowe;

An act for the relief of Samuel Massey and George James;
 An act for the relief of Isaac Muller;
 An act for the relief of Peter Samuel Jaccard;
 and
 An act for the relief of Menzies Gillespie.
 Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:
 An act for the relief of Dr. J. M. Foltz;
 An act for the relief of John G. Mozart;
 An act for the relief of Thomas Kibbey;
 An act for the relief of Charles Rockwell;
 An act for the relief of the representatives of Jesse Seymour; and An act for the relief of John Tilden.

Mr. CUTHBERT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred an act to allow additional compensation to William Easby, made an unfavorable report thereon.

Mr. C., from the same committee, reported, without amendment, an act for the relief of Spencer B. Gist.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred an act for the relief of Cornelius Taylor, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. R., from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Colin Bishop; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred an act for the relief of Josiah F. Caldwell, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred an act for the relief of Samuel Hamilton, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:
 An act for the relief of Henry Richardson, deceased; and
 An act for the relief of Benjamin Hewitt.

HOUSE OF MEETING.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. NORVELL to change the hour of meeting of the Senate to eleven o'clock, was taken up; and, after being amended so as to take effect after Monday next, was adopted.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. M. submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill making appropriation of a sum of money to defray the expenses of an examination and survey of the bar now forming at the mouth of the Red river and the Atchafalaya, in the State of Louisiana; and also of the ledge of rocks obstructing the navigation of Red river, opposite Alexandria, in said State.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections was taken up; and Mr. STRANGE addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill.

CERTIFICATES OF DEPOSIT.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the joint resolution introduced by him yesterday, authorizing certain certificates of deposit to be canceled, and the re-issuing of others in lieu thereof, was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TERRITORIAL BILLS.

Several bills from the House relating to the Territories were read a first and second time, and referred to appropriate committees.

SECURITY OF THE PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. WRIGHT gave notice that he would to-morrow ask the Senate to take up the bill more effectually to secure the public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish defaulters.

And then the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 13, 1839.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, the rules were suspended to enable the committees to report, any matter giving rise to debate to be laid over.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Latham.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Miles W. Dickens.

Also, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the securities of Elias T. Langham, late surveyor of public lands in Missouri and Illinois; which was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to establish certain collection districts, and for making ports of entry therein.

Also, the following:

Resolved, That this House will on Friday and Saturday, the 15th and 16th instant, after the morning hour, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the consideration of the following bills, and give the same the preference over all other business during the abovementioned period, to wit:

Joint resolution of the Senate (No. 4) authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made;

House bill (No. 472) to define the number, compensation, and duties of officers of the customs;

House bill (No. 797) further to provide for the relief of distressed American seamen in foreign countries;

House bill (No. 818) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans;

House bill (No. 488) to establish ports of entry;

House bill (No. 1010) to authorize the cancellation of certain debenture bonds on the exportation of coal;

House bill (No. 96) for the reorganization of the Treasury Department;

House bill making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, and buoys, for the year 1839;

House bill (No. 695) making appropriations for the building of custom-houses at New Orleans, Philadelphia, and Savannah; and House bill (No. 766) making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein mentioned, and for the survey of certain harbors.

And that said bills be taken up in the order in which they stand in said resolution.

Also, the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That a detailed report and drawings of the light-houses at Barfleur and Ostend, prepared by Lieutenant Colonel B. Ayerige, a chief engineer of the State works of Pennsylvania, be printed for the use of this House.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, asking aid to construct a canal round the falls of the Ohio river; and the same was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BRONSON moved to include the bill to allow the privilege of drawback, and abolish distinctions in ports of entry.

Mr. CUSHMAN remarked that that bill was already before the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having been discharged from it.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. DE GRAFF, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the purchase of two hundred copies of Jones's "Digest."

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Josiah Rogers, Richard Bond, Gates Hoyt, and William Hawkins.

Mr. STEWART, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Russ, Roach & Russ.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the Committee on Commerce, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Charles Kohler.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Charles Simpson, Joseph M. Shepard, and Mary Peck.

Mr. S. also, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas W. Taylor.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Isabella Hill, and the other heirs-at-law of Samuel Hill, deceased.

Also, without amendment, Senate bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Williams, jr., deceased.

Also, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company.

Mr. LYON moved its engrossment, stating that he had no desire to press the question on its passage to-day.

Mr. LINCOLN opposed this motion, both as giving the bill a preference over others, and the more as it contained a principle, that of giving the company a credit of six years, which had never yet been sanctioned by Congress.

Before the question had been taken, the morning hour had expired, and the Speaker announced the special order, being the consideration of business in relation to the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. BOULDIN, all the bills in the two Committees of the Whole House were referred to the same committee, viz: that on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS moved to include the anti-dueling bill in the special order.

Mr. BOULDIN had no objection to include it within the spirit of the order, if it did not exactly fall within its letter.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, embracing a statement of the amount of gold and silver coined at the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, since its establishment.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, on leave, reported a bill to provide for the erection of a jail in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. LOOMIS asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee to investigate the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout and others be instructed to transmit to the House, through the Speaker, the journal of their proceedings up to this time, and daily hereafter during the residue of their session, and that the same be printed for the use of the House; and that so much of the resolution as authorizes the said committee to employ a printer be rescinded from this date; and that said committee be further instructed to hold their meetings public.

Objection being made,

Mr. L. moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to lay the motion to suspend on the table; which motion, after Mr. Loomis called for the yeas and nays, Mr. R. withdrew.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, inquired if the committee did not now sit openly?

Mr. LOOMIS replied that it was generally understood they did not.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules; and decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 92; as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Farrington, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Klingsmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Plumer, Potter, Pratt, Reilly, Richardson, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, Charles Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Swearingen, Taylor, Tins, Toucey, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, Whittelsey, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, Belf, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, Jennifer, Henry Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Lyon, Marvin, Sampson, Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Milligan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Peck, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Randolph, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, and Yorke—92.

Mr. LOOMIS then gave notice that he should to-morrow, immediately after the morning hour, renew this motion.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. BOULDIN, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. RENCHER in the chair,) in execution of the special order, and took up the bills in the following order:

Senate bill entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia.'

Sundry amendments proposed by the House being agreed to, and thus amended, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

A bill to incorporate the Washington City Benevolent Society.

A bill to incorporate the Navy Yard Beneficial Society of the City of Washington.

A bill to incorporate the Washington Manuel Labor School and Male Orphan Asylum Society of the City of Washington.

Mr. JENIFER, at the suggestion (he said) of a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] submitted the following amendment; which was agreed to:

And that no power is hereby given, or is intended to be given, to issue bank notes, or exercise any banking privileges whatever.

A joint resolution directing the manner in which certain laws of the District of Columbia should be executed.

A bill (Senate) making appropriations for the support of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia.

A bill to provide a free bridge across the eastern branch of the Potomac river, in the city of Washington. [The bill appropriates $30,000 for the construction of the work, besides purchasing the stock of one of the existing toll bridges.]

Mr. GIDDINGS moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and gave his reasons for the motion at length; in the course of which he was several times called to order for arguing the abolition question, and maintaining that the seat of Government could not be long continued in the District of Columbia with the existence of the slave trade therein; assigning this as a reason against making liberal appropriations for public works here.

Messrs. RIVES, JENIFER, and C. H. WILLIAMS raised the questions, but they were overruled by

The CHAIRMAN, who decided that the merits or demerits of the slave trade could not be permitted; and thus far only Mr. GIDDINGS's remarks were arrested.

Mr. GIDDINGS again proceeded in the same course of discussion, in going over the question of slavery, and said there were those here who preferred the permanency of slavery to the permanency of the Union itself.

Mr. HOWARD again called him to order for irrelevancy of debate.

The CHAIRMAN required Mr. H. to reduce his point to writing.

Mr. HOWARD insisted that, by the rule, he was not required to do so unless the call to order was for personality of debate.

The CHAIRMAN adhered to his construction of the rule.

Mr. HOWARD took an appeal from that decision.

Mr. BOULDIN made an earnest appeal to the committee to dispose of the question, and not sacrifice all the interests of the District to a discussion of this kind.

Mr. GLASCOCK, with due deference to the Chair, said the Chair would have best consulted its own dignity, and the dignity of the House, by arresting the gentleman from Ohio in pouring out his gross calumnies and foul aspersions upon the citizens of this District.

The decision of the Chair was sustained by Messrs. ADAMS and McKENNAN, and opposed by Messrs. BELL and THOMAS. The greatest confusion prevailed during this time, a number of members rising and addressing the Chair at the same time; but it was finally arrested by the Chair going behind the point immediately before the committee, and stating that he had no hesitation in deciding Mr. GIDDINGS to be out of order for irrelevancy of debate.

Mr. HOWARD thereupon withdrew his appeal on the preliminary point.

Mr. SLADE then took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, pronouncing the gentleman from Ohio out of order; but, after some confusion, the committee divided by tellers, and the decision was affirmed—ayes 103, noes 31.

Mr. ADAMS said that, as this decision imposed a new principle, he wished to know in what manner it would be reported to the House?

The CHAIRMAN replied that no report at all would be made of it.

Mr. REED then moved that Mr. GIDDINGS have leave to proceed in order; but it was refused without a division.

The question was then taken by tellers; on striking out the enacting clause, and resulted—ayes 76, noes 56.

So the enacting clause of the bill was stricken out; and so ordered to be reported.

A bill to provide for the erection of a new jail in the city of Washington.

A joint resolution to fix the salary of the physician of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia, [permanently, at $600 a year.]

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the enacting clause; which was disagreed to, and the bill laid aside.

A bill for the suppression of gaming in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PETRIKIN complained of the extraordinary power given in this bill to constables to lay an information and arrest upon mere suspicion, and depicted with great earnestness the results of passing such a law.

Mr. JENIFER made a general explanation of its provisions.

Mr. PETRIKIN again reiterated his objections to the bill, and moved to strike out its enacting clause.

Mr. BOULDIN said that, though a member of the committee which reported the bill, it was no particular favorite of his; but as the people of the District had asked for it, he had thrown no obstacle in the way.

Mr. NAYLOR said the bill contained only such provisions as existed in similar bills in all well regulated cities and municipal communities. It was high time that gambling shops in this city were put down, and he knew his colleague to be as much opposed to them as any man living.

Mr. PETRIKIN was opposed to gambling, but he was more opposed to tyranny, and he opposed this bill because it put an irresponsible power in the hands of petty officers, who might oppress the honest citizen.

He withdrew his first motion, and moved to strike out the fifth, tenth, and twentieth sections of the bill; but it was disagreed to, and the bill was laid aside to be reported.

The bill to prohibit the giving or accepting, within the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

Mr. BOULDIN said, as this bill, though not reported by him or from the committee of which he had the honor to be chairman, was included within the operation of the special order for District business, with his perfect assent, (a courtesy demanded from him by the kindness of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] in yielding the floor for District business last year,) it might be inferred that he was in favor of its passage, and if he gave a silent vote against it he might be misinterpreted. He wished, therefore, to explain that he should neither vote for nor resist it, because, by the common law, in force here as well as elsewhere, a man who kills another in a duel shall suffer an ignominious death, and that was law enough for him, and not too much, for it ought in all cases to be inflicted where, according to the principles of the common law, the party is guilty of murder.

Mr. ADAMS, after a few remarks, expressed himself in favor of the bill in the form which it passed the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, moved to insert the word "knowingly" in the provision respecting the carrying a challenge; which was agreed to.

Mr. JENIFER offered the following as an amendment to the bill:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any member of the House of Representatives so far forgets himself as to use offensive language in debate, which shall be decided to be personal to any member by a vote of the House, the offending member shall immediately make an apology to the member so offended, and to the House.

Mr. J. was understood to be opposed to the bill, but if it should be passed, that there should be some feature that would restrict gentlemen to decorous language in debate. That there should be some responsibility attached to those who might be disposed to take advantage of the law, and overstep the bound of courtesy and propriety to which parliamentary debates should be confined.

Mr. TOUCEY hoped the amendment would not prevail, and that the gentleman would see the propriety of withdrawing the same, as it was one of a most extraordinary character. He considered the rules of the House amply sufficient to protect the members from personal abuse; if they were not, that the House had the power, under the Constitution, to make the rules sufficiently binding to effect that object.

Mr. ADAMS considered the proposed amendment one of an extraordinary and unconstitutional character, inasmuch as it goes to abridge the freedom of speech in the House by law. It would be referring to the judiciary the power by law to decide upon and judge of the rights and privileges of this House. He believed that it had the power, under the Constitution and its own rules, to regulate the matter as far as proper or necessary.

Mr. TILLINGHAST was understood to oppose the amendment, because it would be incorporating in a general law two principles. It would be restricting the privileges of the members of the House of Representatives, whilst it would not operate upon the Senate. He conceived the rules amply sufficient; if not, it was a subject properly within the province of either House to regulate by such rules.

Mr. JENIFER had no objection that the amendment should be made to operate also upon the Senate. His object was to discontinue disorderly conduct here, which, he thought, might arise under the law, if there be not proper restriction upon the members.

Mr. TILLINGHAST would be happy to see the principles adopted in the rules for the government of the House; but was opposed to incorporating the same in a general law. He suggested to the gentleman whether it was not out of place in this bill; and hoped the matter would be left to the House, to be regulated by its rules; if not, it would be better to include both Houses.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, stated that the effect of this amendment would be to make blackguards of men who might never otherwise be so. Moreover, forced explanations are degrading, while voluntary ones were honorable.

Mr. BOULDIN begged his friend again to remember that debate would block out the District business.

The amendment was then rejected.

Mr. CRABB moved to strike out the words in italics in the following paragraph:

"Or shall knowingly carry or deliver an acceptance of such challenge or message, to fight a duel in or out of the said District."

Mr. C. insisted that the retention of these words would make the provision unconstitutional.

The amendment was rejected, and the bill ordered to be reported.

The committee then rose, and reported the various bills and amendments to the House.

Those without amendment were ordered to a third reading, and the amendments to the others concurred in except the following:

The anti-dueling bill being taken up,

Mr. CRABB moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report whether any provision in the first is unconstitutional.

After some further discussion,

Mr. BOULDIN begged to remind gentlemen that while they were talking about dueling, they were murdering the business of the District.

Mr. CRABB withdrew his instructions; and

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, moved others, in effect, to instruct the committee to report a bill on the subject of dueling, conformable to the laws of Virginia and Maryland, to operate in those portions of the District heretofore within those States.

Mr. HAYNES remarked that that was the existing law.

Mr. CRABB preferred his own, and renewed them.

Mr. BOULDIN demanded the previous question; which was carried; and the question being on the main question, namely, the ordering the bill to a third reading,

Mr. STANLY moved to lay it on the table; which was lost without a division.

Mr. JACKSON, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to a third reading, which were ordered; and were—yeas 107, nays 22.

And the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-day.

Mr. BRONSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading. His object was to give gentlemen who desired it an opportunity of at least one day's examination.

After some remarks from Messrs. UNDERWOOD, PRENTISS of Mississippi, ROBERTSON, SERGEANT, and BOULDIN, the last gentleman moved the previous question; which was carried; and on the question of reconsideration,

Mr. TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 45, nays 99.

So the House refused to reconsider.

The bill to prevent gambling in the District of Columbia was taken up and informally passed over.

All the bills ordered to a third reading were then passed, except the joint resolution to fix the salary of the physician to the penitentiary, which was rejected.

On the division on passing the anti-dueling bill, there were—yeas 88, noes 19; no quorum.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved an adjournment.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused; and the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. LINCOLN said if the gentlemen who were lounging in the galleries would come down and attend to the public business, they could have a quorum.

Mr. CRABB moved a call of the House; which was lost—54 to 59, yet still no quorum.

The SPEAKER counted the House, and, finding no quorum (only one hundred and fifteen) was present,

A motion was made to adjourn, and rejected; and a call of the House had been ordered, and was proceeding when our last advices were received from the Capitol, at six o'clock.

Mr. MURRAY moved that the House adjourn; which it refused to do by a vote of 52 for, to 57 against it.

The Clerk having proceeded to call over the absentees—

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, moved an adjournment, which was lost—ayeas 58, noes 59.

The call proceeded.

Absentees were called, when it appeared that one hundred and twenty-eight members were present.

The doors of the Hall were now closed, and lights brought into the Hall.

Mr. LOOMIS moved to suspend the call; which was lost.

Mr. RIVES moved to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were called for and ordered.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired of the Chair what would be the consequence if the House should vote to adjourn while the doors were closed?

The SPEAKER. The doors will be opened. [A laugh.]

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

Mr. WORD renewed it; but on a new demand for the yeas and nays, withdrew the motion.

The call proceeded, and excuses were received for absentees.

Mr. RENCHER moved to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were demanded, (the roar was too loud, and the confusion too great, to tell by whom,) and ordered by the House; and, being taken, stood—yeas 43, nays 76.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BRIGGS stated that a number of the members were outside the doors, and moved that they have liberty to come in; which was negative.

The SPEAKER now read the 58th rule of order, which requires that absentees not excused shall be taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and brought to the House.

And the question being on carrying this rule into execution,

Mr. BELL said this was, at all times, a very harsh proceeding; and as the bill, he presumed, would come up in order after the morning hour to-morrow, unless the House should order otherwise, he hoped it would not be insisted on. He moved to suspend all further proceedings in the call.

The question was taken by tellers, and decided in the negative—ayeas 49, noes 61.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was ordered by the Chair to execute the rule.

Mr. PARRIS moved to adjourn.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted as follows—yeas 50, nays 72.

So the House again refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER, after some time, reported that the Sergeant-at-Arms had taken eleven members into custody.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved to suspend the call; which was lost—ayeas thirty-three, noes not counted.

The following members were now, in succession, brought before the Chair by the Sergeant-at-arms, viz:

MESSRS. GRAY, GRAVES, SAWYER, TURNER, BANKS, BIRDSALL, KENNEDY, JENIFER, HARPER, GREENELL, MONTGOMERY, MARVIN, and HARRISON.

The SPEAKER inquired of each what excuse he had to render in extenuation of his offense in absenting himself from the business of the House without leave?

Various excuses were given, some of which produced much merriment.

Mr. JENIFER said his constituents had agreed to pay him a per diem for his attendance here, but not a per noctem, and he was not going to attend in the night.

Most said they had gone to dinner. Some refused to give any excuse.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, however, they were all permitted to take their seats without paying the fine imposed by the rule.

The question was now put on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Andrews, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, John Campbell, Casey, Cheatham, Clark, Clowney, Corwin, Cranston, Cushman, Davee, Davies, Deberry, Dunn, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Giddings, Goode, William Graham, Grandland, Grant, Gray, Greenell, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Holt, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kennedy, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Loomis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McKennan, Mercer Morgan, Naylor, Noble, Parker, Paymaster, Paynter, Peck, Phelps, Pott, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Putnam, Randolph, Reed, Reily, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Sergeant, Sheffer, Shepler, Slaide, Spencer, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Webster, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yorke—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Bouldin, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Chambers, Coles, Dromgoole, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Howard, Montgomery, Petrick, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Sawyer, Thomas, Turney, and Word—18.

So the bill was passed.

The House then (a little before eight o'clock) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 14, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the seizure and detention of the brigs Enterprise, Encomium, and Comet; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITION, ETC.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of citizens of Knox county, Illinois, praying for a post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented a communication from L. J. McCormick, on the subject of an improvement in the steam boiler; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUBBARD asked the unanimous consent of the Senate for leave to introduce a bill for the settlement of the claims of the State of New Hampshire against the United States; which was granted, and the bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BENTON also asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to authorize payment to the Missouri volunteers whose horses were lost on the voyage to Tampa Bay; which was agreed to, and the bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill repealing the duty on salt, and the abolition of the fishing bounties, reported the same without amendment; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate of the 31st ultimo, as it was considered in the above report; which was agreed to.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year 1839, reported the same without amendment; and gave notice that he should ask its consideration on Monday next.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of D. Raymond and G. Friend, praying a revision and modification of the tariff, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W., from the same committee, to which was referred the act to repeal the proviso of the second section of the act of March 3, 1837, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claims of the United States against certain banks, reported the same without amendment, and asked the Senate to consider it at the present time; which was agreed to. After some explanatory remarks from Mr. W., it was ordered to be engrossed, and then read the third time and passed.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred an act for the relief of Jamison & Williamson, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act for the relief of Sarah Windham;

An act granting a pension to Susannah Rowe; and

An act for the relief of Dennis Trammell.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do not pass:

An act for the relief of Solomon Prewett; and

An act for the relief of Samuel Edgecomb.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

A bill for the settlement of the claims of the State of New Hampshire against the United States; and

A bill to authorize payment to be made to the Missouri volunteers, whose horses were lost on their voyage to Tampa Bay.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of John McCartney, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred an act for the relief of Heman Harris, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Thomas Stewart, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the papers in relation to the claims of James Erwin, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

CERTIFICATES OF DEPOSIT.

The joint resolution authorizing certain certificates of deposit to be canceled, and others issued in lieu thereof, was read a third time and passed.

The following bills were severally considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed:

A bill for the relief of Joseph Bassett, with an amendment;

A bill to fix the compensation of the senior clerk employed in the Adjutant and Inspector General's office;

A bill for the relief of the Nantucket Steamboat Company;

A bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefits of the act granting preemption rights, which was approved on the 19th June, 1834;

A bill authorizing the relinquishment of the 16th sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof;

A bill to authorize Peter Warner, of Indiana, to purchase a certain half section of land;

A bill for the relief of Asa Armington and others;

A bill for the relief of Elisha Eldridge; and

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Agnes Dundas.

A bill for the benefit of the clerks in the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, was taken up, and, on motion, was ordered to lie on the table.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

A bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections was taken up; and

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate for three hours and a half in opposition to the bill, and in reply to the remarks of Messrs. CRITTENDEN and RIVES.

Mr. PRESTON intimating his intention of addressing the Senate on the subject, the bill was informally passed over.

SECURITY OF THE PUBLIC MONEY.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill more effectually to secure the public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish defaulters, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, and several amendments having been offered by the Committee on Finance,

Mr. WEBSTER said he was not prepared to vote for these amendments, and wished a little time to consider them.

Mr. WRIGHT said that the bill had been before the Senate a considerable time, and he had respectfully invited the attention of Senators heretofore to the subject. It was well known to every Senator that it was necessary to act promptly on the bill in this body, if they wished to secure its passage the present session. Mr. W. then explained the several amendments that had been submitted.

Mr. WEBSTER said that, from his present impressions, he could not say that there was much in this bill that he would oppose, as its tendency was to increase the just responsibility of public officers; but there were some novel provisions in it that he was not prepared, without further consideration, to sanction. Mr. W. here commented on a principle embraced in one of the amendments.

Mr. WRIGHT said that it had been a subject of much complaint that, by the present system, officers could retain funds in their hands, and at the settlement of their accounts, if their claims were not admitted, they would defy the power of the Government, and would stand suit, where their claims were almost invariably allowed. The intention of the committee, by the amendment, was to prevent courts entertaining a claim for compensation for any service that was not provided for by law.

Mr. WEBSTER was opposed to the system of counter-claims alluded to by Mr. WRIGHT, but thought that the bill gave too much power to the accounting officers, and he thought it ought to be somewhat more limited. He said that if the committee had offered all their intended amendments, he would wish they should be printed, and further action on them postponed until tomorrow.

Mr. WRIGHT said there was another amendment which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to employ a limited number of clerks to enable him to carry out the requirements of the bill; and said that the committee had submitted all the amendments which they contemplated offering.

Mr. RIVES then rose, and submitted a substitute for the whole bill; which was read. [The substitute provides for the deposit of the revenues and the securities of the Government in banks.]

Mr. R. said that he was aware that his substitute was very imperfect, as he had drawn it up hastily last night, after having, for the first time, perused the bill brought in by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT thought the course of the Senator from Virginia a very strange one. The bill had been introduced on the 3d of January, and had been reported by the Committee on Finance on the 8th of February, and yet gentlemen complain that they have had no time to examine its provisions. It was evident that this amendment, from its extent, could not be ready for examination by to-morrow. He would, therefore, give the Senate notice that he would ask for the consideration of the bill on Monday next.

Mr. RIVES thought that the amendment would be printed and placed before them in the morning; but he was not disposed to hurry the matter. He said he might be considered guilty of a constructive charge of inattention and neglect on this subject, and, he would confess, with some reason. But he had been so much employed by other matters of importance recently, that he had no time to look into it before last night, when he hastily drew up his substitute.

The substitute was then ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Various bills from the House of Representatives, on subjects connected with the District of Columbia, were referred to the appropriate committee.

After a short executive session, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 14, 1839.

The first business in order being the report of the select committee on the public lands, and Mr. ROBERTSON being entitled to the floor,

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked that gentleman to give way to allow him to present and lay on the table a memorial of great importance.

Mr. ROBERTSON refused.

Mr. CLARK made a similar request to Mr. R., to enable him to lay on the table a substitute for the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON assented.

Mr. C.'s proposition was then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG again urged his request to Mr. ROBERTSON.

Several MEMBERS asking the nature of the memorial,

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that it was from the collector of New York, complaining of the proceedings of the select committee on defalcations.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The unfinished business of the morning was then resumed, being the following resolutions heretofore reported by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the select committee on the public lands:

Resolved, That the committee report to the House, and ask leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject-matters referred to them, and that the journal of the committee be reported and published.

Resolved, further, That the committee deem it inexpedient to take further steps on the subject of the public lands this session.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert in lieu thereof a proposition for the semi-annual distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of their Federal numbers,

Mr. ROBERTSON resumed, and again occupied the floor till the expiration of the hour.

COMMITTEE ON DEFALCATIONS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then renewed his request to the House to be permitted to present the memorial he had before referred to. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Then (said Mr. C.) I must move a suspension of the rules, for it is a matter involving great injustice to the collector of New York, and I now ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MENEFEE asked what the memorial was.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would explain, if the House would allow him to do so. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. SIBLEY intimated that he should prefer to have it read, as he wanted to know upon what he would be voting.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, with the consent of the House, he would make a brief statement of its contents. [Renewed cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. GRANT moved a suspension of the rules, that Mr. C. have leave to make the statement; but being included in the motion already made, he did not press this.

Mr. MENEFEE desired to know whether this be a memorial from the collector of the port of New York, protesting against the action of a committee of this House?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. Not protesting, but merely stating his own case, and asking the House to take measures to prosecute the inquiry in relation to a witness.

Mr. MENEFEE. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, (Mr. M.'s voice was completely drowned by the loud cries of "Order?" and the reporter heard no more, if he said it.)

Mr. CHAMBERS expressed a hope that the opposition to presenting this memorial would be withdrawn.

The question was then taken; and the result was—yeas 124, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beine, Bicknell, Birdsall, Borden, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Carter, Chase, Chambers, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dringgoole, Dunson, Dunn, Elmore, Farrington, Fillmore, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, James Graham, William Graham, Grandford, Grant, Garand, Greenell, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Harrison, Harper, Haykins, Haynes, Herod, Hoffman, Holsey, Holt, Robert M. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sheridan Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, and Yorke—73.

So the rules were not suspended, (two thirds not voting therefor.)

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st instant, transmitting copies of certain charges preferred against Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, by Passed Midshipman Charles C. Barton, and all communications in relation to said charges.

Mr. NAYLOR said it was his wish that this communication should be referred to a select committee, and he made that motion. He had no desire to consume the time of the House, but thought that the interest and honor of the Navy and the country required that this communication should have that reference. There are complaints from all the officers who were in the Mediterranean, whilst he had command of that squadron, of his unjust and unofficerlike conduct. He said that there was not a vice degrading to humanity that Elliott had not practiced and been guilty of whilst he was in command on that sea. No vice to which a man can be addicted, but what has been charged against him on the files of the Department. Mr. N. then cited an article published in the United States Gazette, in which Commodore Elliott was puffing himself. He demanded why he did not come forward like an honorable highminded man, and demand an investigation of the charges that have been alleged against him. He feared the result. The Constitution was almost cleared of its gallant tars to give place to jackasses, hogs, and cows, which were stowed away in every part of the vessel that was not already occupied with hay to feed these animals upon.

Mr. N. also charged him with purchasing in foreign countries, and stowing wines and brandies in the public vessels, and was guilty of "huckstering" the same to a profit in this country. Charges of this grave nature, he contended, should be fully investigated; and the Department have concluded to rely on Congress to make a proper disposition of them. He then referred to the case of Midshipman Barton, and the cruel conduct of the Commodore in reference to that transaction. When that officer was wounded in a duel, he was carried on board the Constitution to have his wound dressed; and when the surgeon was in the act of taking the fractured bones from the bleeding wound, the Commodore came on board and peremptorily demanded that the wounded man should be removed from the vessel; and notwithstanding the interference of the surgeon and others to persuade him from it, it was of no avail. That officer, writhing with pain, and almost in the agonies of death, was conveyed ashore and left in the hands of foreigners, by whose generosity and kind feelings he was taken care of, and finally carried to England on board another vessel. The Commodore has disgraced the Navy, and has thrown everything in the way of a trial. Now let us see whether a court of inquiry shall be instituted.

Mr. N. then referred to the transaction between him and Lieutenant Hunter, and denounced his conduct in relation thereto. He stimulated duels. Nothing pleased him better than to see his officers fight duels, yet he took good care that he was not involved. The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy have indicated a wish for an investigation, and the country demands it.

Mr. McCURE addressed the House at much length in refutation of many of the charges against Commodore Elliott. He said he seconded the motion of his colleague with cheerfulness, and hoped it would prevail. An impartial report on these numerous allegations would be satisfactory not only to the members of that House, but to the community generally throughout the United States. He cordially seconded the motion for investigation; and he hoped it would be a thorough one, and that such a report should be made as ought to come from a committee of that House, embodying full, clear, distinct, and thorough developments of the facts in relation to the charges brought against this officer. This was due to the character of the Navy, as well as to the man, and the more so to the latter, because all the authentic information they had was ex parte, made out upon calls for information from the Navy Department, so ingeniously drafted that only one side was asked for, and not a word of the other. Mr. McC. did not appear there as the particular friend of Commodore Elliott, for he cared not if he did not know him; but he did know him, and, so far as he did, he knew him to be a high-minded and honorable man. Moreover, he had certainly done some service to the public; and Mr. McC. referred to his gallantry during the late war, citing the record of his deeds. Mr. McC. thought he might be considered to be too great a disciplinarian, especially in these lax and loose times, when every petty officer considered himself on an equality with his superior. After going into a full and explicit examination of many of the allegations against Commodore Elliott, Mr. McC. concluded by expressing an earnest hope that the House would order the investigation without delay.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, followed, and commented with great severity upon the conduct of Commodore Elliott.

Mr. CRARY moved the reference of the communication to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PICKENS spoke for some time, with great severity, on the conduct of Commodore Elliott.

Mr. NAYLOR then modified his motion, as follows:

Resolved, That the report be printed, and that a select committee of — be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Captain Jesse D. Elliott, of the United States Navy, while in command of the squadron in the Mediterranean, in the years 1837 and 1838, and particularly into the allegations of tyranny and oppression towards the officers under his command; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and have leave of absence from the service of the House while engaged in the inquiries committed to them by this resolution.

Mr. CAMBRELENG drew the attention of the House to the condition of the public business, and the short time left to act upon it, and he appealed to the gentleman from Michigan to withdraw his motion, and let the subject take the reference proposed by Mr. NAYLOR, which Mr. C. felt assured would meet with an assent from all quarters of the House.

Mr. CRARY withdrew his motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then demanded the previous question, which was seconded—ayes 63, noes 59, and carried.

So the communication was referred to a select committee, which was ordered to consist of seven members.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a tabular statement prepared by the Register of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, giving information of the annual value of imports, and payments into the Treasury on account of them, and the whole cost of their collection, with the rate per cent. upon the value of imports; and also on the abovementioned payments from 1789 to 1837, inclusive, adding the whole expenditures of the Government for each year during the same period.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, giving information of what payments and emoluments are allowed to Lieutenant Wilkes and the officers under his command in the South Sea exploring expedition, and of the character of the expedition.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. HOWARD moved to take up the two messages of the President of the United States, lying on the Speaker's table, relating to the northeastern boundary of the United States; which motion being agreed to, they were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill, the title of which is as follows: "A bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1839."

Before the Clerk had commenced reading the clauses,

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend the enacting clause by inserting the words in italics: "Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums, amounting to —, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated," &c.

Mr. A. said the blank could be filled up at the third reading. He added that it was his intention to make the same motion on all the general appropriation bills, as it would greatly facilitate the ascertaining the gross amount of appropriations made each session of Congress.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had no objection to the amendment, though the amount appropriated under every bill was reported in a separate document every year. He not only should not object to this amendment, but he wished it was made the duty of every committee of the House to report, with each bill, the amount of money it involved.

The amendment was agreed to without a division.

When the item for the salary of the secretary to sign land patents ($1,500) came up,

Mr. BOND said he thought it high time the act authorizing it was repealed, as it was passed during an exigency that no longer existed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the Committee of Ways and Means could only report the appropriation authorized by law.

Mr. BOND thought the Committee on the Public Lands should look into the matter; and his opinion was that the law should be repealed, the office being no longer necessary.

When the items for public printing were reached, Mr. BOND inquired in what manner the public printing was executed? whether by private contract, or by advertising for terms?

Mr. CAMBRELENG could not answer that question.

Mr. BOND gave notice that he should hereafter move a proviso that all the executive printing shall be advertised and let to the lowest bidder.

On reading the clauses for the pay of the Commissioners of the Navy Board,

Mr. CRARY said it was high time for the House and the country to examine into the uselessness of this navy board; for, indeed, they were worse than useless—a hindrance to the Navy and its efficient construction. They were an irresponsible body, and stood in the way of all improvements. Mr. C. then referred, in terms of censure, to their proceedings in the cases of steamships, the exploring expedition, and several others. He did not deny that these gentlemen might be good commanders; but they had shown themselves to be utterly disqualified to decide on the proper form of vessels; for those built under their direction were the very worst in our Navy.

Mr. C. concluded by moving to strike out the appropriation for this board.

Mr. INGHAM informed the gentleman that the Committee on Naval Affairs had the subject of the propriety of abolishing this board now under inquiry.

Mr. CRARY was aware of it, but they had made no report yet.

Mr. MALLORY assented to all Mr. C. had said of the absolute propriety of abolishing this board, and should vote for his motion. Mr. M. then went into a number of other particulars of their acts, and said it was in vain to look for efficiency from a body constructed as this was.

Mr. M. stated what his plan was, namely: to establish four bureaus, responsible to the Secretary of the Navy, he being so to Congress. 1. A bureau of purchases, at the head of which should be placed an old purser of the Navy. 2. A bureau for furnishing cannon. 3. Another for construction. 4. Another for equipment. All to be placed under old and experienced officers. The present system was approved of by no one, but condemned by every friend of the Navy. It was time now for the House to take the matter in hand, for he had no confidence that the Committee on Naval Affairs would move in the matter.

Mr. BRONSON gave notice of an amendment he should hereafter move, namely: to abolish the board from and after the 1st of July next, and reduce the appropriation one half.

Mr. REED expressed his surprise at Mr. CRARY's proposition; for as the Secretary of the Navy was generally appointed from political considerations, instead of with reference to practical experience, the Board of Navy Commissioners was absolutely indispensable; and he went on to advocate its continuance at considerable length.

At the request of Mr. BRONSON, Mr. CRARY withdrew his amendment; and Mr. B. moved the one indicated above.

Mr. ADAMS insisted that this amendment was not in order. This was an appropriation bill; and how could a proposition be ingrafted on it to repeal a law?

The CHAIRMAN overruled this point.

Mr. PICKENS moved to add to the amendment a provision that the bureau system should be introduced into the Navy Department, and appropriating $15,000 for the purpose.

Mr. BRONSON accepted this as a modification of his own.

Mr. EVERETT said, if the amendment was not out of order before, it certainly was with this addition.

The CHAIRMAN said that, under the 66th rule, which precluded any appropriation being made in the ordinary bills without an existing law for it, this branch of the amendment was clearly out of order.

Mr. BRONSON, upon this decision, withdrew his acceptance, and the question was on his own amendment.

Mr. HOFFMAN said he was taken by surprise, as the House itself must be, at this proposition to abolish a board from which, at one time, such great expectations were formed. His opposition to the motion arose rather, however, from the time and manner in which it was attempted to be effected—for his prejudices were all against its continuance—than from any wish on his part to keep up this body. He thought they were not prepared at this time to cut off so important an arm of the service, at least till they took time to inquire whether the Navy could get on without it.

Mr. ADAMS expressed his surprise at the quarter from whence this opposition sprang—from the gentleman from Michigan, a State in the situation of the unfortunate King of Bohemia, who had not a boat in his dominions. Michigan cared nothing about a navy, but others did. This board Mr. A. believed to be absolutely indispensable to the efficiency of the Navy; and to abolish it would be to cut it in two—to put it to death. If, however, evils did exist, let them be investigated by a committee, and let another plan be carefully prepared, if the present was found objectionable. There was another reason for this attack upon the commissioners. They were politically obnoxious to the dominant party, though they had all three fought and bled for their country. If, however, they were to cut off appropriations because abuses existed in, or were charged against, the Departments for which they were made, they would have to sponge the whole out—ay, even those for the pay of Congress itself. He denied the truth of the charges against the Navy board; they were mere assertions.

Mr. PICKENS was indisposed to abolish this board without providing a substitute; and he regretted that the late period of the session would preclude the possibility of devising a proper plan. He was certainly opposed to the present system; but this was the first time that he had ever heard an intimation of the political complexion of the present commissioners. The great objection to it was the commingling of responsibility, by which there existed none at all, and therefore he preferred the bureau system. Mr. P. regretted that the gentleman from Massachusetts should have made any allusions to the geographical source from whence the motion first came. The gentleman from Michigan, representing a frontier State, surrounded by inland seas, ought to feel as much interest in the prosperity and efficiency of the Navy as any member on that floor. Mr. P. thought, upon the whole, the subject had better be laid over until the next Congress, when there would be more time to mature a better plan.

Mr. POPE was disposed to sustain the amendment; but he concurred in the propriety of the last suggestion of Mr. PICKENS.

Mr. WISE said, from an experience of six years on the Naval Committee in that House, he was convinced that this board ought to be abolished; for it was the chief cause of the inefficiency in our naval service. He concurred in the opinion that they had better do nothing now, but call upon the Secretary of the Navy to report a plan for the entire reorganization of the Navy Department.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that to-morrow and next day he should ask the House to continue the consideration of the appropriation bills.

The committee then rose and reported; and the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 15, 1839.

The VICE-PRESIDENT submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. DAVIS presented a remonstrance against the passage of the bill repealing the duty on salt; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of citizens of western New York, praying that wheat and other grain may be imported free of duty, for the purpose of being manufactured into flour and exported; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented a memorial from citizens of New Orleans, praying redress for injuries committed by the Mexican Government, and protesting against the convention lately agreed to for arbitrating the differences between the two Governments; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROANE presented a memorial from Thomas R. Saun; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. R. also presented a memorial from William Hebb; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial of Charles Henry Hall, on the subject of the magnetic telegraph; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act for the relief of Rosaline Prudhomme;
An act for the relief of James Moor;
An act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of the late Robert Farmer, deceased;
An act for the relief of James L. Stokes, and for other purposes;

An act to authorize the trustees of the township of Oxford, in the county of Butler, and State of Ohio, to enter a section of land in lieu of section sixteen, in said township, for the use of schools; and

An act for the relief of Abraham Stipp.

Also, the following with amendments:
An act for the relief of William Moore; and An act for the relief of Philip Catlet.

Also, an act for the relief of William B. Livesay, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred an act for the relief of the heirs of Colonel Daniel Boone, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. N. regretted that he was selected as the organ of this report, as he was aware of the importance of the services of Colonel Boone, both in the Revolutionary and Indian wars; but his claims did not come within any of the rules which the committee had laid down for their government. If the Senate, in considering the report, should come to a different conclusion, he would, with pleasure, concur with them.

Mr. N., from the same committee, reported the act for the relief of James Maxwell, without amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Ashbell Mason, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred an act for the relief of Joseph Pierce, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill for the relief of John Balch, jr., reported the same with amendments.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and obtained, leave to withdraw the petition and papers of Frederick Gebhardt.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of the heirs of Colonel Francis Vigo, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. C., from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of Captain Henry Conway, and the petition of Betsey C. Shethar, only child of John Shethar, deceased, an officer of the Revolution; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Public lands, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do not pass:

An act for the relief of William Marbury;
An act for the relief of Amelia Leach; and An act for the relief of Oliver Welch.

Mr. P., from the same committee, reported an act for the relief of Thomas Todd, without amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendments:

An act to alter and amend the organic law of the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa;

An act to define and establish the eastern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa;

An act to authorize the election or appointment of certain officers in the Territory of Iowa, and for other purposes; and

An act to amend the act establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred an act to approve and confirm an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, creating certain banks, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. W., from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying the alteration of the southern boundary line of said Territory, as there was not time at the present session properly to investigate and decide on it; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution requesting the President to present to James Rumsey, jr., a gold medal, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Also, to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Somerville Pinckney; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Librarian be directed to make out and to report to the Senate, at the commencement of the first session of the next Congress, a catalogue of all the laws and of all the legislative and executive journals and documents of the several States and Territories, now in the Library.

Mr. A. said it was necessary to offer some remarks explanatory of this resolution. Being upon the Library Committee, he felt it his duty to make some inquiry as to the contents of the library; and he was very much surprised to learn that the journals and documents of the States and Territories of this Union were not to be found there; and, indeed, but few complete sets of the laws of the States and Territories were there. In a conversation with the librarian, he believed, he told him that, with the exception of the State of New York, there was no instance of a complete set of the public documents of the Legislature of any State in the Union being in the library; and in the case of the State of New York, it only applied to a few years back. His object in submitting the resolution was to show the extent of the deficiency, in order to predicate on it a movement, at the next session, to supply this unaccountable defect in the national library. It is a remarkable fact (said Mr. A.) that you can lay your hand on all the proceedings of the English Parliament in our library, and yet you cannot find the journals and public documents complete of any State in the Union. In making this statement, his object was to disclose at the next session the extent of the deficiency, and upon that disclosure to predicate a demand to supply it. He believed that in most cases the journals of the State Legislatures might be found from the foundation of the State governments. It could not be a question with the members of the Senate as to the necessity of having these documents preserved to the national library. This was all he had to say in explanation of the resolution, which, from its nudity, might appear light and ridiculous.

The resolution was then adopted.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of Asa Armington and others;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Bassett;

The bill to fix the compensation of the senior clerk in the Adjutant General's office;

The bill for the relief of the Nantucket Steamboat Company;

The bill for the relief of Elisha Eldridge;

The bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefits of the act granting preëemption rights, which was approved on the 19th of June, 1834;

The bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth section granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof;

The bill to authorize Peter Warner, of Indiana, to purchase a certain half-section of land;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Agnes Dundas; and

The bill for the relief of Michael Ambrister, were severally read a third time and passed.

OWNERS OF THE ALLEGHANY.

The bill for the relief of the owners of the ship Alleghany, and their legal representatives, was taken up; and, after some remarks from Messrs. KING, CRITTENDEN, NILES, and HUBBARD, laid on the table until to-morrow.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The special order, viz., the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections, being taken up,

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked leave to withdraw the amendment offered to the bill some days since, and offered a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. PRESTON then addressed the Senate at length in defense of the bill, and in opposition to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROANE followed Mr. PRESTON in opposition to the bill, and in reply to the remarks of Mr. RIVES.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. RIVES and ROANE; and, about eight o'clock, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 15, 1839.

The SPEAKER announced the unfinished business of the morning hour to be the report of the select committee on the subject of the public lands—Mr. HARRISON being entitled to the floor.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked him to give way to enable him to submit a motion to call upon the committees for reports.

Mr. HARRISON declined, and went on to reply to Mr. ROBERTSON, and in defense of a resolution submitted by him in the select committee. Mr. H., in discussing this subject, went behind the ground assumed by the former gentleman, and argued that it was entirely inconsistent with the Constitution for the Federal Government to hold lands within the limits of the States, and it was never the intention of the framers of that instrument that it should. If this were so, and he cited the proceedings on the adoption of the Constitution to prove it, no new powers had been or could be given to the General Government over this subject. To show what was the understanding of Congress thereon, he cited a variety of resolutions upon it from 1780 down, and the compacts with various States. Mr. H. spoke during the morning hour, and gave way to a call for the orders of the day.

Mr. H. submitted a motion to extend the morning hour till one o'clock, (making it two hours,) from and after to-morrow.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said this was too important a motion to be taken without the yeas and nays, for it would block out for one hour every day all the business of the country. The yeas and nays were ordered on his request.

Mr. ADAMS moved to lay the motion on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays; whereupon,

Mr. HARRISON withdrew it.

Mr. SHIELDS moved a suspension of the rules, setting apart this day for the consideration of private bills, in order to take up the bills on the Speaker's table on their engrossment, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

At the request of Mr. HAMER, Mr. S. included joint resolutions, and at that of Mr. BRONSON, bills on their final passage. He then withdrew the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he hoped the House would make no suspension of the rules, but allow the business to progress in its prescribed order.

Mr. ELMORE inquired what the bills were, which were of such pressing necessity, that private claims must be set aside.

The SPEAKER was not at liberty to respond, as the motion precluded all debate.

Mr. ELMORE then asked for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. CUSHING suggested to Mr. SHIELDS to include the calling upon committees for reports.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had hoped the House would have gone on with the appropriation bills; and he moved to lay the motion on the table; which was agreed to—yeas 89, noes 62.

Mr. CAMBRELENG reiterated the hope that the House would indulge him in going on with the public business, especially as there were so few days remaining of the session.

Objection being made,

Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved to lay the motion on the table, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. CHAMBERS remarked that there had been no unnecessary delay in acting on the appropriation bills, and he thought they had better proceed with the numerous claims before them.

The motion to suspend was agreed to—yeas 126, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Bird-sall, Bond, Borden, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Chaney, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Cranston, Cushing, Cushman, Davey, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Giddings, James Graham, William Graham, Gray, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Hoffman, Holt, Howard, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lincoln, Logan, Loomis, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Noyes, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Putnam, Randolph, Reed, Kelly, Reucher, Rhett, Richardson, Robinson, Robinson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shepher, Spencer, Stratton, Swearingen, Taylor, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Vanderveer, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Word, and Worthington—136.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. Allen, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Corwin, Crabb, Crockett, Darlington, Dennis, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goods, Graves, Haley, Harper, Henry, Herod, Kennedy, Lyon, McKenney, Menefee, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Pearce, Peck, Petrikon, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Kariden, Ridgway, Saltonstall, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Stanley, Stuart, Stone, Taitferro, Thompson, Toland, Toney, Underwood, Sherard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yorke—58.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Comptroller of the Treasury, in compliance with an act of Congress, transmitting a statement of the balances standing upon the books, of the revenue which had remained unsettled by collectors of customs and others, which has been due more than three years prior to the 30th of September.

Mr. HOFFMAN then rose, and said he understood the Speaker had done him the honor to place him on the select committee of investigation raised on motion of Mr. NAYLOR, on Commodore Elliott's proceedings in the Mediterranean. He asked to be excused from serving on this committee, for the following reasons. It was known that one of his colleagues [Mr. CURTIS] was serving on another (the defalcation) committee, and his other colleague [Mr. CAMBRELENG] was fully occupied in attending to the public business as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. For Mr. H. to serve, would involve his entire absence from the sessions of the House, because a laborious examination of persons and papers would have to be gone into; and hence the affairs of his constituents would be necessarily neglected, as they fell, for the reasons he had given above, almost entirely upon his shoulders. His duty to them, to himself, and to the House, compelled him to prefer this request.

Mr. H. was excused by the House, and the Chair directed to fill the vacancy.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for 1839."

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. BRONSON to reduce the appropriation for the Navy Board one half, and to abolish the board after the 1st of July next.

Mr. POPE was entitled to the floor, and he addressed the House at great length. With reference to the amendment, he said he had been at first inclined to vote for it, but, upon reflection, he did not think they were prepared to effect so sudden and great a change in one of the great branches of the service. He was willing to pause till next session. Mr. P., however, said he hoped he should be excused for speaking on matters and things in general. His election came on in August next, and he wished to say something not only for the benefit of the House, but also of his constituents. He commenced by an appeal to Mr. ADAMS to republish a document that came from Mr. A.'s own pen, one of the ablest productions that ever fell from an enlightened statesman, his work on our right to the fisheries, whenever he felt disposed again to discuss the right of petition.

Mr. ADAMS rose to a question of order. He wished to know if the gentleman's argument was relevant. He had no objection to it; on the contrary, he hoped the gentleman would be allowed to proceed; but, then, Mr. A. hoped he would be indulged in an opportunity of replying, and not be gagged with the question of irrelevancy.

The CHAIRMAN ruled Mr. POPE to be out of order on this ground.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved that he have leave to proceed.

Mr. POPE assured the House he had no intention of discussing the question of abolition.

Mr. ADAMS, disclaimed any objection on his part to the gentleman's proceeding with his argument; but as he had made a direct appeal to Mr. A., and had alluded to a matter upon which he should feel himself called upon to make a response, he wished the question of relevancy settled at once, so that, in his reply, Mr. A. might not be put down.

The House granted the leave asked without a division.

Mr. POPE again assured the House that he should never discuss the question of abolition; and for the reason that he had no fears about it, for he never knew a man from New England emigrating to a slaveholding State ever to set a negro free. [Laughter.] Mr. P. was going on to narrate an anecdote connected with this subject, when he was called to order by the Chair.

Mr. SLADE desired to know if the new principle was about to be established in Committee of the Whole, that everything not direct to the subject under consideration was out of order?

The CHAIRMAN had made no such decision. Everything on the subject of the Navy, on appropriations and expenditures, &c., would be in order, but every one must see that nothing on the right of petition for the emancipation of slaves could be in order in discussing the bill to provide for the naval service.

Mr. SLADE rose again, and made some allusion to Mr. BELL's remarks the other day on a similar point raised on Mr. GIDDINGS.

Mr. BELL instantly called Mr. S. to order, and said the Chair was entirely correct in arresting Mr. POPE's remarks. Mr. B., however, moved that he have leave to proceed in order.

This motion was again agreed to.

Mr. POPE assured the committee he had no intention of transgressing the rules of order, and he refrained from further allusion to this topic.

Mr. P. then referred to Mr. MURRAY's speech, which he said he had read with great pleasure, designating it by far as the ablest defense ever made of the Administration, and expressed his admiration of the absence in it of all denunciation and calling of names. He advised his Whig friends to pursue an honest course, and never to make charges without proof. Mr. P. then went into a general review of the leading principles of the last and present Administrations, to all of which he dissented, and gave his reasons at great length. Mr. P. advocated liberal expenditures, on the ground that heavy disbursements were beneficial to the poorer classes, &c. He approved of the land scheme of Mr. CLAY, and contended that if the plan had gone into operation it would have prevented the redundancy in the Treasury which that gentleman foresaw. He was understood also to advocate the American system of Mr. CLAY; but, before concluding, waived his right to the floor for the present.

Mr. INGHAM said he had a few words to say to the amendment, which was, whether the appropriation to the Commissioners of the Navy Board should be stricken out? The proposition, he contended, was one of an extraordinary character, and goes totally to abolish that board, without even the inquiry whether that part of the service is prepared for such an event. The gentlemen making it, too, do not present any feasible plan or proper provision for the derangement which will be consequent upon such change. The law by which that board was established was passed in the year 1815, upon the pressing recommendations of very many distinguished officers of the Navy, who had seen much service in the defense of their country, and who were possessed of great practical knowledge of the wants of that branch of the service. It was then urged as of pressing necessity. It was necessary then, as now, because the Secretary of the Navy was not possessed of that requisite practical knowledge of the wants and discipline of the Navy.

Mr. I. then reviewed the organization of that department of the British service, and proved that it had, in such organization, two or three distinct boards, whose actions undergo the supervision of the Secretary, and that they were subject to his control. The great experience of that Government found it necessary, having a proper regard to the character and interest of the Navy, that such a board should be in operation. But the principal objection urged to abolish this board was, that gentlemen could not find where the responsibilities of that Department were vested. The law fixes the responsibility where it should be. This board has certain defined duties to perform, subject to the supervision and control of the Secretary. He had never yet ascertained that any gentleman was disappointed or found any difficulty in receiving information; and he had no doubt, if gentlemen would call upon this board, that they would promptly receive such as properly pertains to the board, and so as to the Secretary. But the same argument of irresponsibility would, with equal plausibility, apply to every other Department of the Government. He would ask those who are in favor of such reorganization as would bring into operation a bureau system, whether the same grounds of complaint could not, with equal propriety, be alleged against it? and whether gentlemen would not then be placed in the same dilemma? He said it was impossible for this officer, on the instant, to give full and satisfactory answers to the various points of inquiry which devolves upon him as Secretary, many of which may involve a practical knowledge of the service. It could not be expected that his head was a storehouse; that he could, at a moment's warning, give this practical information. So far as the responsibility is concerned, this board and the Secretary are jointly responsible, if they are not individually so, and therefore this charge must fall to the ground. But there is a division of this responsibility, as is found in every Department of the Government—even the Congress itself—and he asked if gentlemen were prepared to abolish the whole in consequence?

Some of those who had spoken upon the subject contended that, since the organization of the board, the vessels have been badly constructed. It was altogether matter of taste and skill. Mr. I. referred to the frigate United States built previous to its organization. When that was built it was universally said that it was the worst sailer in the Navy; but it was subsequently proved that its bad sailing was owing to the trimming of the vessel, and after alterations in that respect, it proved to be the fastest sailer in the Navy. This might be the case with many of the vessels constructed under the supervision of this board. He said the House had been favored with much declamation, but very little evidence. Mr. I. then referred to the charges made by Mr. MALLORY, that the delay and tardy movements of the exploring expedition was owing to the management of this board. He was pleased to find that the responsibility of that delay had been changed from the Secretary, which had been so frequently charged against him heretofore.

Mr. MALLORY was understood to say that he charged the Secretary with the delay, and the Navy Board with improper construction of the vessels.

Mr. INGHAM said neither of them was censurable for delay, nor were the Navy Board for the bad construction of the vessels belonging to this expedition. They were built under the superintendence of Commodore Jones. He was appointed to that charge before a vessel was commenced, and had the entire management of the same. He trusted that this was the last charge about that expedition he should hear. The Navy Board, he contended, had acted in all matters under the control and general direction of the Secretary, and never proceeded without consulting him; and, so far as the charge that they had prevented the building of the steam vessels authorized by law being any ground for its abolition, it would also be good ground to abolish the office of Secretary of the Navy; and he asked gentlemen if they were prepared to do that act?

He said if the Navy Board should be charged with being incompetent men, that would be a legitimate cause of inquiry; or, if they had been negligent in duty, that would be good cause for inquiry; but the mode proposed by the amendment of the bill would not be the proper way to try them, because it goes to cut them off without such inquiry. His own opinion was, that the whole naval service should be reorganized, but the House could not strike off this branch without throwing the whole system into confusion.

Mr. PETRIKIN thought, as to the propriety of abolishing this board at this time, there might be some doubt, but as to a reorganization of the whole Department there could be but one opinion. This board, he contended, had been an incubus upon the naval service, and whenever any branch of it should impair the proper operation and usefulness of the whole, it should be lopped off. It had become odious with the people, (for which there was, no doubt, good ground,) and with him that was proper cause for reorganization. He said that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who claimed to be the exclusive advocate and conservator of the Navy now, represents the people of the very State who, during the last war, declared that it was unbecoming a religious and moral people to rejoice at the success of our arms in that very branch of our service.

Mr. P. then inquired why it was that the Naval Committee had made no report on the necessity of reorganizing the Navy Department, as they were instructed to do early in the session?

Mr. INGHAM stated that no such resolution had been referred to that committee.

Mr. PETRIKIN contended that the resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Navy Board, necessarily involved the reorganization of the whole Department. Mr. P. detailed a number of existing abuses in the naval service which required correction, most of which grew out of the incompetency and incapacity of this irresponsible board. He hoped the amendment would prevail, if it had no other effect than that of telling these men that the public were not blind to their conduct. He disclaimed saying a word against them as men, but only as a body.

Mr. PARMENTER cited the case of the Charlestown navy-yard as a proof of this board. Before its establishment, that yard was a chaos of confusion and disorder; now it would compare with any in the world. Faults there might be; imperfections might exist; but these were rather owing to the crude organization of the board, than to themselves. The law was wrong. They were originally intended as advisers to the Secretary of the Navy, whereas the whole control of the Navy had been placed under their supervision, even to the making of contracts for supplies, for which they could not be supposed, from their previous occupations, to be qualified. Mr. P. went on to review the sections of the law, and was understood to oppose a total abolition of the board, but to be in favor of some revision of the law. He also made an argument against the bill to construct a dry dock at New York.

Mr. CRARY remarked that this discussion had, at least, rendered it evident that something was very wrong in the organization of this Board of Navy Commissioners, and even the last gentleman from Massachusetts had made it appear that it had usurped all the powers belonging to that branch of the Government. This they did by means of drafting their own by-laws; in other words, they drafted their own regulations; and so drafted them as to place the whole power of the Navy Department in themselves. It was this of which he complained, and he felt assured that if that board was continued, they would ruin the Navy. He made no application to the men composing it, but to them as a body. Mr. C. then replied to the remarks of Mr. ADAMS yesterday, who made an explanation, that he did not mean to deny the right of Mr. C. to make the motion he did.

Mr. BRONSON disclaimed, in submitting his amendment, anything like an insidious attempt to inflict a blow upon the Navy, as had been thrown out by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but the contrary. Of the politics of the members of the board he had never heard a word, till it fell from the gentleman himself. He had no personal or political object in view; and, as a proof that it was not so considered by others, his motion had been advocated by gentlemen of the Opposition as well as of his own party. After advocating his amendment for some time, he gave it as his opinion that an overwhelming majority of the service and of the country, and at least two thirds of Congress, were in favor of abolishing this board, and if not done by the present Congress, it would be by their immediate successors.

Mr. MERCER protested against the incongruity of introducing such a proposition as this in an ordinary appropriation bill, the provisions of which ought exclusively to be limited to the expenses of Government. Mr. M. was also opposed to the proposed abolition of the board; though he admitted that many alterations were needed in the manner in which the Navy Department was conducted. As for the bureau system, the President and Secretary could now establish it, by directing divisions of duty among the three commissioners, and all the personal responsibility would follow, for a bureau was nothing more than pens, ink, paper, and tape.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the committee rose and reported.

And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 16, 1839.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Edward D. Tippet; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WALL presented the memorial of the trustees of the Presbyterian Church of Springfield, in the State of New Jersey, asking compensation for the destruction of property during the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, requesting Congress to pass a law altering the present mode of issuing titles to land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial from the same, praying the establishment of a port of entry and custom-house at some point on the Missouri river, and allowing those who trade with Mexico by land the privilege of drawback and debenture.

Mr. L. went into a number of interesting details, showing the importance and former extent of the trade between this country and the Mexican provinces, and with the Indians of the Oregon Territory, and its comparative insignificance at present. The Hudson's Bay Company, from their great facilities and advantages, were monopolizing the whole Indian and Mexican trade, as they imported their goods free of duty; and they would soon obtain a dangerous ascendancy over the minds of the Indians. He said that if there was not prompt action on the part of Congress on this subject, not only the trade with the Mexican provinces would cease, but that the territory inhabited by these Indians would be wrested from us. Mr. L. said he had, some days since, introduced a bill for the occupation of the Oregon territory, with a view to doing something on this subject, which he hoped the Senate would consider and act upon at an early day.

Mr. L. also presented a memorial very numerous signed by the inhabitants of the counties of Benton, Rives, Polk, Cole, Morgan, and several other counties, or parts of counties, in the State of Missouri, asking Congress to pass a law to create a new land office, to be located either at Jefferson City, or at Versailles, in Morgan county.

Mr. L. said that the memorialists represent that they are subjected to great inconvenience and expense, as well as loss of time, in traveling such great distances as they have to do at present, for the purpose of entering their lands. He thought their request was a most reasonable one, and hoped that his friend from Arkansas, [Mr. FULTON,] who is acting chairman of the Committee on Public Lands will take this subject under serious consideration, and report a bill at the earliest possible period in his power. Missouri was now the largest State in the Union, and he felt confident was the richest in natural resources; yet she had but six land offices, while her neighbor, Illinois, had ten, though she was a much smaller State. The young and vigorous Illinois seemed to have been always regarded by Congress with a favorable eye; she gets donations of lands for canals, and to aid in the construction of her railroads; pays less revenue to the Post Office Department than Missouri, yet has double the amount of mail facilities; and has even threatened the General Government that if the national road is not made to Alton from Vandalia, it shall not be made at all. Modest determination! He said the people of the free States are unceasing in their exertions to obtain what they desire, and present their memorials, petitions, &c., to Congress in the most business-like form, which makes them more successful in their applications than the slave States, who ask less, and do not take the same pains to present their memorials in an imposing form.

Mr. ROANE presented a memorial of the Washington Building and Improvement Company, asking for an act of incorporation; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING presented a memorial from masters and pilots of steamboats plying between Mobile and New Orleans, asking for the construction of light-houses on that route; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial from T. H. Perkins, and numerous other persons, asking that the spirit ration of the Navy may be discontinued.

Mr. W. thought this memorial merited attention, as somewhat interesting to the maritime concerns of the country. It sets forth some facts well worthy of consideration; among others, that most of the cases of insubordination and mutiny on board of ships were clearly traceable to the daily use of stimulating drinks. It was not now, as formerly, when few of our merchantmen abolished their use on board; but far the greater portion of our vessels were navigated in that way, and, in consequence, there had been a great moral revolution in the character of our sailors, and that these benefits were extending themselves to the merchants in the shape of diminished insurances, the officers invariably preferring the risks where intoxicating liquors were not allowed.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of Thomas B. Parsons; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Havre de Grace; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do not pass:

An act granting a pension to Reuben Murray; and

An act for the relief of William A. Cuddeback.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, reported without amendment the following bills:

An act for the relief of Sibel Barnes;

An act for the relief of Harvey Reynolds; and

An act for the relief of Eliphalet Spafford.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred a bill to amend an act confirming certain land claims in the State of Michigan, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred a bill to authorize payment to be made to certain Missouri volunteers, for services in the years 1829 and 1836, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the documents in relation to the claim of Colonel A. H. Morgan, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, to which was referred an act for the relief of certain officers of the Florida militia, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of Preserved Clapp, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Levi Folsom, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts of the heirs of Captain Jesse Copeland;

An act to amend an act entitled "An act regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers," approved April 16, 1818; and

An act for the relief of Captain John Vannettin and his company, for their services during the late war.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred an act for the relief of Stephen Marselis, reported the same without amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LINN said that some days since he gave notice that he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill granting to the Washington County and St. Genevieve Railroad Company (incorporated by the Legislature of Missouri) the right of preemption to five hundred thousand acres of land to aid said company in the construction of their road. He now rose (he said) with the intention of asking that leave; but before the question was taken, he begged leave to remark that this was a subject in which the whole country was interested, but more particularly the great valley of the Mississippi. This road would be connected with the Iron Mountain, the most remarkable, as well as the richest, deposit of iron ore in the whole world. He said that if the State of Missouri and the General Government would lend only a slight assistance, the great mineral resources of Missouri would at once start into active life, and the Great Valley, as well as the country at large, would realize the full value of its existence. The Senate would remember that a ship was lost at sea some time since on her way from England, with $500,000 worth of railroad iron for the State of Illinois. If Missouri is aided a little, she will, in a few years, make iron enough for the consumption of the United States, and she can and will make iron cheaper and better than any country in the world.

Mr. L. then, on leave, introduced a bill for the benefit of the Washington County and St. Genevieve Railroad Company; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate at the commencement of the first session of the next Congress, all facts and information relative to the execution of the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the "act to regulate the deposits of the public money," approved 23d June, 1836, and particularly all facts and information in answer to and touching the following questions, to wit:

1. What amount of money has been deposited with each State, under this act, and at what periods?

2. In what banks, in each State, was the money deposited, and in what amounts, in each bank, at the time of the transfer to the States?

3. Of what description of funds, whether metal or bank notes; and if of both, in what proportions did the deposits consist, in each bank of each State, at the time of the transfer to the States?

4. What was the description of funds received by each

State; and if both metal and bank notes were received, what were the proportions of each so received by each State; and what was the depreciation, if any, of the bank notes received by each State, at the time of reception?

5. What investments or dispositions were made by each State of the deposit made with it; whether invested in stocks, and if so, in what kind of stocks, and to what amount; whether applied to public works, or to State or to other institutions, and if so, to what kind of works or institutions, and to what amount; whether loaned out or distributed, and if so, whether to institutions, to bodies corporate or otherwise, or to individuals, and to what kinds of institutions, bodies, or class of individuals, and to what amount, and what were the circumstances and conditions of such investments, dispositions, loans, or distributions?

Resolved, That to the end of obtaining the information required by the foregoing resolution, the Secretary be directed to correspond, if necessary, with the proper authorities of the several States.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to send to the Senate a copy of the recent report of Daniel West, commissioned to investigate claims against the Miami Indians, with a statement of the expenses of the commission, including all charges, to whom due or paid, and for what services, designating the charges made or allowed for mileage, and by whom charged; the date of the appointment of the commissioner and secretary, and at what time the commission commenced and closed.

MICHAEL AMBRISTER.

The bill for the relief of Michael Ambrister was read the third time and passed.

REPEAL OF SALT DUTY.

The resolution accompanying the report of the Committee on Finance authorizing the printing of a document in relation to the salt tax, was taken up for consideration; and, after some remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN, WRIGHT, DAVIS, and BENTON, its further consideration was postponed until Monday next.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The unfinished business, being the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections, was then taken up, and Mr. NORVELL addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CUTHBERT intimating a wish to address the Senate on the subject, the bill was informally passed over.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

To-day being set apart for the consideration of bills relating to the District of Columbia,

The bill to incorporate Georgetown College, in the District of Columbia;

The bill supplemental to the "Act granting certain city lots to the corporation of the Columbian College for the purposes therein mentioned," approved July 14, 1832;

The bill to extend the jurisdiction of the corporation of the city of Washington over the Potomac bridge, &c.; and

The joint resolution authorizing the opening of an alley and the execution of certain deeds in the city of Washington; were severally considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to provide a free bridge across the eastern branch of the river Potomac, in the city of Washington; and

The bill to incorporate the Washington Manual Labor School and Male Orphan Asylum Society of the City of Washington and District of Columbia; were ordered to be laid on the table.

The bill to incorporate the Washington Silk Company was advocated by Messrs. BAYARD, MERRICK, and LINN, and opposed by Messrs. ALLEN, BENTON, KING, SMITH of Connecticut, and NILES; and,

On motion of Mr. NILES, the bill was indefinitely postponed—yeas 17, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, White, Williams of Maine, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Davis, Foster, King, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, and Tallmadge—13.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 16, 1839.

Mr. HARRISON resumed his remarks on the subject of the public lands, as brought before the House by the following report from the select committee of twenty-six:

Resolved, That the committee report to the House, and ask leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject-matters referred to them, and that the journal of the committee be reported and published.

Resolved, further, That the committee deem it inexpedient to take further steps on the subject of the public lands this session.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert in lieu thereof a proposition for the semi-annual distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of their Federal numbers.

Mr. H. gave way, without concluding, for the orders of the day.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that his motion to suspend the private orders for the public business yesterday, included this day also; but he observed from the Journal and the papers that it was not so understood, and therefore he should renew the motion this morning.

Mr. BIDDLE had, however, first caught the Speaker's eye, and he asked leave to present a bill of a public nature, with a view to have it immediately referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS would ask permission to present no less than four hundred petitions of a public nature, with which he had been charged, and, unless he could do so, he should object to others having a preference given to them.

Mr. BIDDLE thereupon moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, inquired what the memorial was about.

Mr. BIDDLE stated that it was a memorial from claimants on Mexico, setting forth the anxiety they felt that the treaty of arbitration should have been suffered to fall through by that Republic, and asking Congress to take the matter into its serious consideration. As only two weeks of the session remained, it was desirable that some prompt action should be had upon it?

The rules were suspended, ayes 107, noes not counted, the memorial received, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. B. added to his previous statement that the petition referred to the fact that the President of the United States, in his anxiety to have this treaty ratified, sent a public vessel and a special messenger to Mexico; that the vessel had returned, and they declare that the latest advices from that Republic add confirmation to their conviction, that the treaty would not be ratified, as was predicted by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, the committees were called on for reports, and the Committee on the Public Lands being first in order,

Mr. CASEY rose, and said, that he had no report to make, but he was very desirous to submit a resolution of inquiry of considerable importance, both to his State and to the country.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, by the act of Congress regulating the deposit of the public money in the State banks, approved June 23, 1836, it was provided that at least one bank be selected in each State or Territory, if any such existed willing to be employed as a depository of the public money; and whereas, there are two banks in the State of Illinois, both of them solvent and safe, neither of which is now employed as the depository of the public money collected in said State; and whereas, the money so collected in Illinois is deposited in the State Bank of Missouri, to the manifest injury of the said banks of Illinois, and the people of the State; and whereas, the Secretary of the Treasury, under the provisions of the act of 1789, has selected many banks which would have been excluded from the benefits of the deposit act of 1836, as depositories of the public money, which said banks, in common with the banks of Illinois, could not have been selected as depositories of the public money under the provisions of the act of 1836: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform this House at what time the Bank of the State of Missouri was made a deposit bank, and what amount of its own notes said bank had in circulation, and what amount of specie it had in its vaults on the 5th of July and on the 16th of August, 1837; also, that he inform this House of the amount of money received for public lands in the State of Illinois, and deposited in said bank, since it has been selected as such depository.

Resolved, That the said Secretary inform this House why he may not, under the act of Congress of 1789, select one or both of the banks of Illinois as depositories of the public money collected in said State, should it satisfactorily appear that the said banks are solvent specie paying banks, and would be safe depositories of the public money.

Mr. EVERETT said it must be obvious, from the reading of that resolution, that it would elicit debate, and as it was more desirable that the committees should report, he must object to its reception at this time.

Mr. CASEY being asked to postpone his request till the other business was through, replied that he had been waiting for this opportunity for a week, and if he waived the present, he might never have another.

As objection had been made, he must then make a motion he had never before made, in the seven sessions he had served in Congress; and he moved to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were— yeas 92, nays 68.

So the rules were not suspended, the motion requiring a majority of two thirds.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported without amendment Senate bill for the relief of the assignees of Louis Baron De Ferret; which was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. TOUCEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Jabez L. White and Asa White, and moved its third reading; which was agreed to.

Also, a bill for the relief of John W. Vaughan and Oliver Perry.

Mr. ADAMS, from the select joint committee on the Smithsonian bequest, reported two several bills, with the resolutions adopted in committee, and the proceedings as detailed in the journal of the committee. The titles of the bills were as follows:

A bill providing for the disposition and management of the fund bequeathed to the United States, in trust, by James Smithson, of London, deceased, for the establishment of an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.

Mr. McKAY moved to call up the motion of Mr. PETRIKIN to print five thousand extra copies of the report of Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, on the best mode of collecting and keeping the public revenue.

Mr. POPE, from the Joint Library Committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the House to inquire into the expediency of providing for the formation of new and accurate indexes to the whole series of journals, reports, and documents since the organization of our Government, proposed to be prepared by Thomas F. Gordon; reported the following joint resolution; which was read twice and committed:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if said compilation is prepared and published by the said Thomas F. Gordon, in the manner proposed by him, and the same annexed to the committee's report, that Congress will take — copies, provided the cost shall not exceed — dollars per copy.

Also, the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Clerk of this House be directed to subscribe for one copy of Niles's National Register for each county clerk in every congressional district in those States in which clerks' offices are established, and one copy for every office in those States in which said offices are not established whose duties approximate most closely to the duties of the clerks aforesaid, and also one copy of said Register for each member of Congress: Provided, The editor of said Register will agree to publish in, or as a part of said work, under the direction of the Speaker of this House, the entire Journals of both Houses of Congress, with the yeas and nays, and all questions decided, and at the end of every session, all the laws passed and the treaties ratified thereat; and furnish the clerks and other officers aforesaid, and all who are now subscribers, or may hereafter become subscribers to said Register, with one copy of said Journal and laws respectively without any addition to the subscription price.

Resolved, That said subscription commence with and include the Journals and laws of the present Congress.

The resolution having been read twice, Mr. P. moved its postponement till to-morrow; but on motion of Mr. TOUCEY, it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WORD, from the Committee on Public Lands, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Samuel Norris, Frederick Longrain, and J. W. Perry.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of certain citizens of Wisconsin, west of Mississippi river, praying for the erection of a penitentiary.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the Committee on Patents was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George Gray.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Major Thomas Harrison; and the petitioners granted leave to withdraw the same.

Mr. DARLINGTON, from the Committee on Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of McCrae and Wakefield, and G. W. Sanders.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, transmitting copies of certain charges against Commodore J. D. Elliott, by Lieutenant Hunter, &c., &c.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, referred to the select committee appointed to investigate charges against the Commodore.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1839."

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. BRONSON, to reduce the appropriation for compensation to the Board of Navy Commissioners one half, with a view to abolish the board on the 1st of July next.

Mr. EVANS, who was entitled to the floor, defended the character of the board, and expressed his surprise at this precipitate proposition to abolish what had been considered as one of the most important Departments of the Government, without a report from a committee, without a recommendation; nay, more, they were told the Secretary of the Navy desired to retain it. Were they, without any examination, scarcely with consideration, but upon mere vague rumor and newspaper paragraphs, to cut off this branch of the service? The complaints made were not chargeable to the Navy commissioners, for they were merely subservient to the Secretary of the Navy; and upon him should the responsibility rest. He denied that the bureau system would be more effective than the present board, or that it would produce a more direct responsibility. Mr. E. then went on to answer the charges brought against this board.

Mr. MALLORY, in reply, said the gentleman had substantially proved the truth of every allegation made by Mr. M. and others; for, in the course of his remarks, he had cited a number of documents which had escaped Mr. M., all, he found, going to substantiate them. Mr. M. then addressed the committee at considerable length in opposition to the continuance of this board; and gave the details of a plan he adverted to a day or two ago—the establishment of a system of bureaux.

Mr. JENIFER opposed the amendment with much earnestness, though he pledged himself if it could be proven that this board was useless, and a better substitute were presented, he would vote for it; but the proposed way of abolishing was insidious in its effect, ill timed, and ill placed.

Mr. KENNEDY then obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. CAMBRELENG, on whose motion the above bill was laid aside; and the committee took up and considered the bill to extend the time of issuing the balance of the Treasury notes authorized by the bill of last session.

The committee then rose, and reported the above bill without amendment; and it was ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 18, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication in relation to the condition of the Bank of Mineral Point, in the Territory of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a preamble and resolutions of the convention of delegates lately in session at St. Josephs, Florida, praying Congress to pass a law to remedy certain evils connected with banking and other incorporations; which were ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WALL presented documents showing the number of suits on the trial dockets of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the seventh circuit, during the last three years; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES presented a petition of a number of citizens of New York, praying the establishment of a fog bell in Long Island Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of John Shaw, for the benefit of drawback on certain exported hemp; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition of Ira A. Sabin, to be allowed a preemption right to a tract of land, and a document showing the necessity of an increase of clerks in the office of the surveyor general of the district of Arkansas; which were severally referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LINN presented a petition of the half-breeds of the Sac and Fox Indians, praying Congress to confirm a certain law of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FULTON presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking the establishment of ports of entry at Little Rock and Van Buren, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the General Assembly of Arkansas, in relation to the relinquishment of the sixteenth section adjoining Fort Smith, and to obtain the confirmation of titles to lands under Spanish confirmations; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial of the Legislative Council of Florida, praying the passage of a law authorizing the enrollment of volunteers for the defense of the Territory; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from a number of citizens residing in the Rock river country, in Illinois, for the establishment of a new land office; which, after some remarks from Messrs. YOUNG, CLAY of Alabama, and LINN, was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred an act for the relief of Isaac Lilley, reported the same without amendment.

Also, an act for the relief of Samuel Hoffman, with an amendment.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred an act for the relief of the assignees of Jacob Clements, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on the part of the Senate acting jointly with the committee appointed on the part of the House, on the Smithsonian bequest, submitted certain resolutions thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. R., from the same committee, reported a bill providing for the disposition and management of the fund bequeathed to the United States, in trust, by James Smithson, of London, for the establishment of an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Susan Gratiot, administratrix of Charles Gratiot, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred an act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to purchase a tract of land belonging to the heirs of John Harris, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the act for the relief of Farish Carter and the heirs of Charles Williams, deceased, reported the same without amendment.

On motion of Mr. PIERCE, the petition of the widow of James B. Spafford, a revolutionary pensioner, was recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims adverse to the petition of Preserved Clapp, was considered and agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following, having been engrossed, were severally read the third time, and passed:

The bill to incorporate Georgetown College, in the District of Columbia;

The bill supplemental to the "act granting certain city lots to the corporation of the Columbian College for the purposes therein mentioned," approved July 14, 1832;

The bill to extend the jurisdiction of the Corporation of the city of Washington over the Potomac bridge, &c.; and

The joint resolution authorizing the opening of an alley and the execution of certain deeds in the city of Washington.

MIRA ALEXANDER.

The bill for the relief of Mira Alexander was read the second time; and on the question of its engrossment, after a discussion in which Messrs. CRITTENDEN, NILES, HUBBARD, MORRIS, CALHOUN, NORVELL, PIERCE, and WHITE participated, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, Linn, Merrick, Norvell, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, Williams of Maine, and Wright—17.

RESOLUTIONS OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. MOUTON said that before taking up the order of the day, he begged to be permitted to present certain resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, adverse to the independent Treasury system, and in favor of a national bank. He had received these resolutions last evening by the express mail, and felt anxious to lay them before the Senate at the first opportunity. These resolutions involved great and important principles of policy and constitutional questions of vital interest to the country. He would not take up the time of the Senate in discussing their merits; this was a question altogether with him and the Legislature of Louisiana, and, differing with them, he intended to address them a letter giving his views. He moved that they might be read and printed.

The resolutions were then read, and ordered to be printed.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of Florida, and the bill in addition to an act to promote the useful arts, were severally read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SECURITY OF PUBLIC MONEY.

The bill more effectually to secure public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters, was taken up.

The amendments submitted by the committee were considered and adopted.

The question was then taken on the substitute offered by Mr. RIVES; and after some remarks from Messrs. RIVES, WRIGHT, and CALHOUN, the substitute was rejected—yeas 15, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—27.

The question then recurring on the engrossment of the bill,

After some remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN and TALLMADGE, the latter offered to amend the bill, by providing that when the collectors shall deposit the public money in any bank, they shall deposit it to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

The question was taken on this amendment, and it was lost—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—22.

Mr. CLAY then moved that the Senate adjourn, which motion was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken, on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was carried—yeas 26, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—16.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 18, 1839.

Mr. MALLORY asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the more effectual execution of the ministerial duties of the Navy Department, the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House, at the commencement of the next Congress, a plan for the reorganization of this branch of the public service, adopting as the basis of his plan the division of those duties now performed by the board of commissioners, and their assignment to separate bureaux.

Objection being made,

Mr. M. moved a suspension of the rules; which was agreed to—ayes 106, noes 26; and the resolution being received,

Mr. M. moved its present consideration; but,

At the suggestion of Mr. EVANS, who intimated his intention to prepare some amendments to it, the resolution was laid over till to-morrow.

Mr. INGHAM, on leave, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to regulate the pay of masters in the Navy.

Mr. PARMENTER asked leave to move to print the proceedings of the Democratic portion of the Massachusetts Legislature on the subject of an independent treasury; which was objected to.

PETITIONS, ETC.

This being petition day,

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that all petitions on the subject of abolition be excluded.

Mr. ADAMS said he had about four hundred petitions to present, about some of which there might be doubts as to whether they related to abolition or not; and how was the question to be decided?

The SPEAKER said the motion of Mr. C. was out of order.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved that those members who had petitions to present, deliver them at the Clerk's table, and that they be entered on the Journal as though formally presented. By this course, nearly a whole day would be gained for the business of the House.

Mr. PICKENS protested against establishing such a precedent, for it was in violation of their rights and their respectability.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, Mr. LINCOLN, and Mr. ROBERTSON opposed the motion.

The SPEAKER referred to the Journal of last session, when a similar order was adopted.

Mr. ADAMS said that resolution was adopted on the 2d of July, only five days before the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved to suspend the rules to receive Mr. CAMBRELENG's motion.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, moved to lay that motion on the table. Lost.

Mr. ADAMS then called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend, but they were refused, and the motion was agreed to—ayes 108, noes 49.

The following petitions were specially brought to the notice of the reporter:

Mr. DOTY presented a statement of the condition and standing of the Bank of Mineral Point, in Wisconsin, made by a committee of the Legislative Assembly, which is as follows:

The committee close the report as follows:

"From a full and particular investigation of its books and funds, and from the statements of its cashier, under oath, as well as from the general confidence of the community in which it is placed, your committee unhesitatingly express the belief that the Bank of Mineral Point is in a sound and safe condition."

Mr. D. also presented the petition of citizens of Wisconsin, to establish a post route from Southport to Foxville, and a post office at Utica. Also, two petitions of inhabitants of Wisconsin, praying that a harbor may be constructed at Milwaukee.

Mr. CHAPMAN, of Alabama, presented the memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, asking an extension of the provisions of the preemption law of June, 1838, so as to include certain citizens who are equitably entitled, but not embraced by said act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, the petition of certain citizens of Cherokee county, Alabama, also for an extension of the provisions of the preemption law, for the benefit of several classes of settlers who are equitably entitled; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, the petition of certain citizens residing on the section of public land where it is supposed the Selma and Tennessee railroad will terminate, at Gunter's Landing, on the Tennessee river, who are entitled to preemptions, giving their assent to an act of Congress granting the said section to said railroad company, and asking a right of preemption elsewhere in lieu thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, the petition of Elisha Moulard, Robert J. Kennedy, and Madison E. Lewis, of Alabama, praying each a right of preemption in lieu of those of which they have been deprived; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, the petition of Charles Taylor, of Madison county, Alabama, for a right of preemption; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, the petition of Captain Matthew Gant, and Captain James Lamar, lately commanding companies in the service of the United States, in the emigration of the Cherokees, praying to have refunded money expended by them for provisions, &c., for their companies before they were mustered into service and furnished by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Also, a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, asking Congress to relinquish the Muscle Shoal canal, on the Tennessee river, to said State; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, presented sundry resolutions of the inhabitants of Montpelier, Washington county, State of Vermont, and its vicinity, in convention assembled on the 17th of December, 1838, and adjourned to the 29th of the same month, upon the wanton and barbarous attack on the steamer Caroline, the neutrality law, and the difficulties on the Canadian frontiers, and moved that the same be committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be printed. Also, the petition of Joseph Brown, praying for an increase of pension, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Also, the petition of John Nelson and numerous inhabitants of Ryegate, county of Caledonia, and State of Vermont, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and in Florida the traffic in slaves, admission of States into the Union recognizing slavery, and the annexation of Texas to the Union. Also, the petition of Walter Harvey and numerous inhabitants of Barnet, same county and State, praying for the same objects.

Mr. HALEY presented the petition of one hundred and sixteen citizens of New London, Connecticut, praying that no State be admitted into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery, and to reject all applications or propositions for the annexation of Texas to the United States. Also, the petition of one hundred and six citizens of New London, Connecticut, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and in the Territory of Florida, and to prohibit the traffic in human beings in the States. Also, the petition of forty-eight citizens of Windham county, in Connecticut, praying that Congress will not admit any new State into the Union whose constitution admits slavery, and to reject all applications and propositions for the annexation of Texas to the United States. Also, the petition of a number of citizens of Pomfret, in Connecticut, praying for the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and in the Territory of Florida, and to prohibit the traffic in human beings in the States. Also, the petition of Mrs. Amy Brown, praying for a pension in consequence of services rendered by her father, Nathaniel Adams, in the revolutionary war, and was slain in battle at Fort Griswold, in Connecticut.

Mr. HARPER presented the petition of John Jamison and forty-two men, and Rebecca Jamison and thirty-one women, of Nashua city, Ohio, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas. Also, the petition of John Jamison and thirty-three males, and Rebecca Jamison and thirty-one females, of Nashua city, Ohio, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENRY presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a national armory at the falls of Beaver river, in said county; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Also, the petition of a number of citizens of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, the slave trade between the States, and to prohibit the admission of any new State into the Union the constitution of which tolerates slavery. Also, the petition of a number of the citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories; also, the slave trade between the States, and to prohibit the admission of any new State into the Union the constitution of which tolerates slavery.

Mr. GRAHAM, of Indiana, presented a petition signed by George M. Profit and one hundred and thirty-five others, members of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, also the Governor and Board of Internal Improvement of said State, (certified by the Secretary of State to be genuine,) praying Congress to appoint competent engineers to examine the surveys made by the Jeffersonville and New Albany Canal Company, and to grant such additional aid to said company as may be deemed proper to carry into effect the object of said company; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Also, the petition of Isaac Dun and ninety-four others, citizens of States bordering on the Ohio river, praying Congress to appoint competent engineers to examine the surveys made by the Jeffersonville and New Albany Canal Company, and that such additional aid be granted by Congress as may be deemed proper; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Also, the petition of James Chambers and one hundred and twenty others, citizens of Washington county, Indiana, praying Congress to make certain grants to citizens of the United States who may make settlements and become permanent residents in the territory of the United States west of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. DUNN presented the petition of John Erebank and forty-eight others, citizens of Indiana, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. YELL introduced the following memorials, petitions, &c., from the Legislature of the State of Arkansas: asking the relinquishment of the sixteenth section in township eight north, range thirty-two west, for the benefit of the garrison at Fort Smith; for an appropriation for the Memphis road, and to make Little Rock and Van Buren ports of entry; and a petition from sundry citizens of Arkansas, praying the establishment of a mail route from Greenville to Manchester, in Clark county, Arkansas.

Mr. HARRISON presented petitions and memorials of the Legislature of Missouri, asking the passage of a law requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the register of the land district, to furnish to each purchaser a copy of the field notes of the land purchased; a memorial asking an appropriation to remove obstructions at the mouth of the Des Moines river; a paper from Samuel Gladney, to accompany his petition for a preemption right; the petition of sundry citizens of Marion, Clark, and Lewis counties, praying the establishment of a post route therein mentioned, together with a remonstrance against the same by many other citizens of the same counties; and the petition of Abner J. Adair, administrator of Wyatt Adkins, for remuneration for depredations committed by the Osage Indians.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the petition of Levi Carr, of the town of Manlius, New York, for an invalid pension. Also, the petition of Asa Merrill and ten others, of the same town, and soldiers of the Revolution, praying for an increase of pension.

Mr. JACKSON, of New York, presented a petition from sundry citizens of the port of Sag Harbor, asking for an appropriation to erect a light-house on Gardiner's Island, Suffolk county, New York.

Mr. BICKNELL presented a petition to establish a post road from Wampsville, in Madison county, New York, by Lenox Furnace, to Cawasselon creek; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVEE presented the petitions of Cyrus Packard, and thirty-six others, of Blanchard, Maine; of John Shaw and eighty-five others, of Exeter, Maine; and of Nancy G. Norcross and three hundred and thirty-seven other women, of the city of Bangor, Maine, praying Congress not to admit any new State into the Union whose constitution tolerates slavery, and to reject all applications for the annexation of Texas to the United States; and further pray that a select committee may be appointed before whom the petitioners may be heard in person or by counsel. Also, the petitions of Cyrus Packard and thirty-seven others, of Blanchard, Maine; of Susan K. Garnsey and three hundred and sixty-seven other women, of the city of Bangor, Maine, praying that Congress would immediately abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and in the Territory of Florida, and to prohibit the traffic in human beings between the several States; which petitions were severally laid upon the table under the order of the House of Representatives of the 12th of December, 1838. Also, the petition of John Palmer and others, praying for a new mail route from Palmer's Corner, in Cornville, to Anson village, Maine; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PARMENTER presented sundry resolutions adopted by one hundred and seventy members of the two branches of the Massachusetts Legislature, constituting nearly one third of that body, expressing their wishes that the Independent Treasury bill should be passed into a law, and declaring their confidence in the President of the United States and the national Administration, and approbation of their measures and policy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Mr. P. also presented the petition of Francis Tinker and two hundred and four others, male and female adults of Ashby, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that all orders of the House restricting the right of petition on any subject may be rescinded. Also, the petition of Josiah Kendall and others, of Dunstable, Massachusetts, for the same object; petition of Micajah Bowers and twelve others, of Chelmsford, Massachusetts, for the same object; petition of Benjamin Spalding and thirty other men, and Polly F. P. Spalding and thirty-five other women, of Chelmsford, Massachusetts, for the same object; petition of Mary S. P. Hayward and seventy-eight other women, of Ashby, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and of the slave trade between the States of the Union; petition of Elizabeth A. Moulton and one hundred other women, of Marlboro', for the same object; petition of Henry Wave, jr., and one hundred and three other citizens of Cambridge, praying that all orders of the House restricting the right of petition may be rescinded; petition of Lucy Gilmore and one hundred and thirty-two others, of Cambridge, for the same object; petition of Isaac H. Bowman and twenty-four men, and Lucy A. B. Brawner and forty-four other women, for the same object.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the petition of T. J. Durant and James Fouzer, of Louisiana, soliciting a grant of land in the said State, for the purpose of cultivating thereon the morus multicaulis, or Chinese mulberry tree, and raising silk worms, and manufacturing silk; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. RIDGWAY presented a petition signed by Slocum Hawland and twenty-five others, respectable citizens of Cayuga county, New York. They respectfully pray the two branches of Congress immediately to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and those Territories where the same practice exists; and so to exercise their constitutional powers, vested in them, "to regulate commerce among the slave States," as entirely to prohibit the domestic slave trade; which petition, under the order of the House of December 12, 1838, was laid on the table. Also, a petition signed by Slocum Hawland and twenty-five other citizens, also from the same section of New York State, who respectfully petition Congress not to admit any new States to this Union whose constitutions tolerate domestic slavery, and promptly to reject all proposals for the annexation of Texas to this Union, from whatever source they may come. That part of the petition which relates to domestic slavery was laid on the table, under the rules of the House of December 12, 1838; and that part which relates to the annexation of Texas was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Also, a petition signed by twenty females and forty-three males, all of age, from Mount Gilead, Marion county, Ohio. They respectfully ask the two branches of Congress to exercise their constitutional powers for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, under the rule of the House of December 12, 1838.

Mr. EVERETT asked leave of the House to offer a resolution; which was read to the House as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the proceedings of his Department, in the execution of the first and second provisions of the 4th article of the treaty of the 1st November, 1837, with the Winnebago Indians, and copies of all correspondence relating thereto; and also, a statement of any information received relating to any speculation or alleged misconduct of any person or persons employed in the execution of the said provisions; and copies of all correspondence relating thereto.

Objection being made to its reception at that time,

Mr. E. moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to do so; but the House refused.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was then resumed, being the report of the Select Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HARRISON resumed and concluded his remarks in reply to Mr. ROBERTSON; when Mr. PARKER obtained the floor, but gave way to Mr. CAMBRELENG, on whose motion the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

Mr. ROBERTSON then submitted a motion that the above subject be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order at half past one o'clock for to-morrow and next day.

Objection being made, Mr. R. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, stating that he should consider this a test vote on the subject itself.

Mr. MURRAY said he should vote against suspending the rules, but that vote was not to be regarded as an expression of his opinion on the matter involved.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 63, nays 106.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

PAYMENT FOR HORSES LOST.

Mr. TURNEY asked the House to take up and consider the bill to revive the act providing for the payment of horses lost in the Florida war; but at the suggestion of the Speaker waived it till sundry bills and joint resolutions from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate committees.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, BY BLAIR & RIVES.

25TH CONGRESS, 3D Session.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1839.

VOL. 7....No. 13.

Mr. T. then renewed his motion; but it did not prevail.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked the House to take up the bill to extend the time of the act authorizing the issue of Treasury notes till May, and to issue the unissued balance.

Mr. STANLY objected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rules; which prevailed without a division.

The bill was accordingly taken up, and the question being upon its passage,

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, called the attention of the House to the fact that the Administration were striving to carry out this system of paper currency.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that this bill only authorized the issue of the balance not issued under the act of last session. It was, in fact, nothing more than to carry out the intention of that law, which was rendered the more necessary from the suspension of one of the southern deposit banks, and the loss accruing in the customs from the shipwreck of the three New York packets.

Mr. MENEFEE should not oppose the bill, but its necessity showed the fallacy of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if this bill had been originally introduced at the desire of the Treasury Department?

Mr. CAMBRELENG, in reply, stated that the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of the session, had asked Congress for the passage of this measure.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. BIDDLE, PICKENS, RHETT, BELL, HALSTED, LYON, and POTTER; when

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS demanded the previous question; but withdrew it at the suggestion of

Mr. STANLY, who made a few remarks in opposition to the bill, and, having concluded, renewed the motion for the previous question, which was seconded by the House, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GRAVES moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in for some time; when,

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, all further proceedings in the same were dispensed with.

The question now recurring upon the passage of the bill,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 102, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Berne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Cleveland, Connor, Cray, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Evans, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Gray, Greinell, Haley, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Noyes, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Pennybacker, Pettkin, Plumer, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reed, Reily, Richardson, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Saltonstall, Sheffer, Shepler, Stuart, Swearingen, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Vandervoer, Webster, Whiteley, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—102.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allan, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Cheatham, Childs, Clowney, Coles, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Elmore, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham Graves, Griffin, Halsted, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lewis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Peck, Pickens, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Rencher, Rhett, Robertson, Russell, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, and Yorke—88.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the title of the same was so amended as to read, "An act to revive and extend" the act authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 19, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the credentials of Hon. REUEL WILLIAMS, elected by the Legislature of Maine, a Senator from that State, for six years, from the 4th of March next; which were read.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the credentials of Hon. THOMAS H. WILLIAMS, elected by the Legislature of Mississippi, a Senator from that State, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. James F. Trotter; which were read.

Mr. W. was then qualified, and took his seat.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial from the Governor of the Territory of Iowa, asking Congress to authorize the seat of Government of that Territory to be located on the public lands, in the county of Johnson, and to make a grant for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of the American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, asking Congress to promote the objects of said society; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of Charles county, Missouri, who propose to emigrate to Oregon Territory, and asking a grant of land therein; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of a number of citizens of Paducah and McCracken counties, Kentucky, in relation to the claim of Francis A. Harrison, on the files of the last session, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, requesting Congress to make appropriations for the completion of the public and military roads commenced by the United States in that State while she was in her territorial condition.

In presenting these papers, Mr. N. said that the Legislature of Michigan had correctly stated that, in consequence of the commencement of the roads in question by this Government, a number of persons had been induced to purchase and settle on the public lands along the routes of these roads. The settlers near their lines are, in fact, very numerous. Their purchases were made in full confidence that the roads would be finished. The Legislature justly consider that this Government was bound to redeem the faith which it pledged to complete them. Again: the Legislature of Michigan represent the great importance of Mackinac as a military post. It was known to be so by all military gentlemen at all acquainted with the country. It was situated in a secluded position, inaccessible in winter, without any road leading to it, unless Congress should prosecute to completion that which they had commenced at Detroit, seventy miles of which only had been made. In every view of the subject, it appeared to him that the request of the Legislature deserved immediate attention and compliance on the part of Congress. Without further remarks, he moved that the memorial and joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and printed. And he begged to call the special attention of that committee to the subject, so interesting to Michigan, and so important, in a military point of view, to the nation.

Mr. LYON said he desired to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, at the last session of Congress, he had introduced a bill to provide for the completion of the roads referred to in the memorial, by giving to the State of Michigan the usual percentage of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in that State, from the time when her constitution was formed to the time when she received it under the act supplementary to the act providing for her admission into the Union, which was about one year. This was, in his opinion, the best mode of making provision for the completion of these roads and closing up all the works of this description begun by the General Government within the limits of the State. The bill passed the Senate, but failing to receive the action of the other branch of Congress, it did not become a law. He again introduced it, at an early period of the present session, and hoped for a more favorable result; but, contrary to what he thought the people of Michigan had a right to expect, there was found to be a majority of the Senate against it, and it was laid on the table. Though the bill proposed to give to Michigan precisely what every other new State in the Union had received, and no more, it was voted down; and among those whose votes were found recorded against what appeared to him so reasonable a proposition, were Senators from some of the new States which had received, not only what was asked by the bill, but millions upon millions of the public money besides, for similar objects. The bill was defeated, and now something else must be done. He was determined not to relax his efforts to effect the object he had in view, so long as he should retain his seat in the body, and if he could not do it in one way, he would try another. He observed a bill on the table to provide for the completion of certain military roads in the State of Arkansas, and as that State seemed to fare rather better than his own, he designed, at a proper time, to offer an amendment to that bill, which would provide for the completion of the military roads in Michigan also.

The motion to refer and print the memorial was then agreed to.

PORT OF ENTRY AT INDIAN KEY.

Mr. NORVELL said that, a few days ago, he had been induced, by a gentleman in whose word he supposed he could confide, to present a memorial from W. A. Whitehead, in reference to the establishment of a port of entry at Indian Key, in Florida. It was printed on his motion. He had subsequently ascertained that the memorial contained a very gross attack upon another gentleman, (Thomas Jefferson Smith,) of whose character he entertained a very favorable opinion. He received the memorial as he was coming into the Senate, and, in reply to a question propounded by him on the occasion, he was assured that it was perfectly respectful in its language. He never would, knowingly, permit this body to become the medium of calumny upon the character of any man. As the only course by which he could remedy the evil of which he had been the unconscious agent, he moved that the memorialist have leave to withdraw this memorial from the files of the Senate, and that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from its further consideration. The subject of Indian Key as a port of entry would still be before the committee upon other memorials and papers.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act for the relief of the heirs of Crocker Sampson;

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Hugh A. Crawford, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation against their passage:

An act for the relief of Jacob Galencia; and

An act for the relief of Robert Milnor and John Thompson.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred an act to authorize the construction of a road from Dubuque, in the Territory of Iowa, to the northern boundary of the State of Missouri, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred an act for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Joshua Huddy, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of John McCalla, asked that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers; which was agreed to.

USEFUL ARTS.

The bill in addition to an act to promote the useful arts was read the third time and passed.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of Florida was taken up; and after an animated discussion, in which Messrs. MORRIS, DAVIS, CLAY of Kentucky, and SMITH of Indiana opposed the bill, and Messrs. BENTON and LINN advocated it, the question was taken on its passage, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wall, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—18.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The bill relinquishing the reversionary interest of the United States to certain Indian reservations, was taken up.

The question being on the engrossment of the bill, it was decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Lyon, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Young—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—30.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 19, 1839.

The House resumed the consideration of the business of the morning hour, being the report of the select committee on the public lands, and the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON to recommit the same with instructions.

Mr. PARKER, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House until the expiration of the hour, in reply principally to the remarks of Mr. HARRISON.

[His remarks will be published hereafter.]

NAVY BOARD.

Mr. MALLORY asked unanimous consent to take up the following resolution, offered at a previous day:

Resolved, That for the more effectual execution of the ministerial duties of the Navy Department, the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House, at the commencement of the next Congress, a plan for the reorganization of this branch of the public service, adopting as the basis of his plan the division of those duties now performed by the board of commissioners, and their assignment to separate bureaus.

Objection being made to its consideration,

Mr. MALLORY moved a suspension of the rules; which the House agreed to do, by a vote of 88 for it to 44 against it.

Mr. M. then moved the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to lay the whole subject upon the table; and upon that motion

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order the same.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay upon the table, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurring upon the motion for the previous question, it was seconded by the House.

Mr. EVANS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion, "Shall the main question be now put?" which were ordered, and were—yeas 110, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crary, Cushman, Davee, De Graft, Dringgoole, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Goode, Grant, Griffin, Haley, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Herod, Holt, Howard, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Maffory, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Menefee, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Pickens, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reilly, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Sawyer, Shepler, Shepler, Spencer, Swearingen, Taylor, Titus, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vandever, Webster, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Word, Worthington, and Yell—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Chambers, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, William Graham, Grantland, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Ingham, Henry Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson, Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, John White, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yorke—72.

So the main question was ordered, and the resolution was adopted.

LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS asked the House to take up and consider Senate bill entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same."

Objection being made,

Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose; but the House refused.

TREATY WITH WINNEBAGO INDIANS.

Mr. EVERETT asked leave of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the proceedings of his Department in the execution of the first and second provisions of the fourth article of the treaty of 1st November, 1837, with the Winnebago Indians, and copies of all correspondence relating thereto; and also, a statement of any information received relating to any speculation or alleged misconduct of any person or persons employed in the execution of said provisions; and copies of all correspondence relating thereto.

Objection being made,

Mr. E. moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose, and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 127, nays 43.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. EVERETT having intimated that he did not wish to consume the time of the House by debating the proposition,

Mr. PARKER moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

And that the report made on the subject by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and decision of the Secretary thereon.

Mr. EVERETT accepted it as a modification, and the resolution as thus modified was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the House granted the Committee of Claims the privilege of holding its sessions during the sittings of the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Treasury, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th ultimo, transmitting a communication of F. R. Hassler, inclosing so much of his survey as relates to the harbor of New Haven, Connecticut.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, it was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TURNEY asked the House to take up and consider the bill to revive a former act for the payment for horses lost in the Florida war.

Objection being made,

Mr. T. moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; which, however, the House refused to do.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The question immediately before the committee was the motion of Mr. CRARY to strike out from the bill the appropriation for the Navy Board.

Mr. KENNEDY, who was entitled to the floor, said he was pleased that the House had, since he obtained it, shaped for itself another course, by adopting the resolution calling for a report of a plan from the Secretary of the Navy, at the next session, for reorganizing this board, and therefore rendered it unnecessary for him to say much as to the particular motion before the House. He thought the course adopted was the most appropriate one. Mr. K. then went on to review the policy of the past and present Administration, and denounced it in unmeasured terms.

Mr. HOWARD then obtained the floor, and said, as a friend to the Navy, he returned his sincere thanks to the gentleman from Michigan for the interest he evinced in hurrying forward the proposition; and, instead of being rebuked on account of the section of country from which it came, as had been done by some gentlemen, he merited their thanks.

He then went on to reply, at length, to his colleague, [Mr. KENNEDY,] in vindication of the Administration. He referred to the essential services which that gentleman had rendered in breaking down the administration of John Q. Adams, which he had just eulogized, and the great talent he had evidenced, and had devoted, to bringing into existence the administrations of General Jackson and Martin Van Buren, which he had just denounced in such unmeasured terms. He looked upon the violent struggle of the Opposition for the Presidency, as the prolific source from which sprung all the evils of the present day which his colleague [Mr. K.] complained of. He then referred to the tariff question, which, he feared, instead of being settled with a single eye to the interest of the country, would be pressed into requisition to subserve party ends, and instanced the periodical attempts to agitate that question just preceding the past presidential election. He referred to the question of limitation to the term of service of the Presidency, which had been spoken of by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] and intimated that he would be in favor of a limitation to one term of six years. He then examined the charge of proscription, which had been so frequently rung in the ears of the party, and referred to the large number of the Opposition in office in the State he in part represented, and elsewhere, and reviewed the course pursued by the Opposition where they had the power.

Mr. KENNEDY briefly rejoined.

Mr. BRONSON said that, at the suggestion of many gentlemen who were friendly to the amendment itself, but who did not consider this as the proper time to press it, and especially since the passage of the resolution of this morning rendered further action at this time unnecessary, he would withdraw the amendment he had offered; and he withdrew it accordingly.

Mr. SLADE proposed to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $9,000 to cover the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent to Hayti.

Mr. BRONSON asked if the amendment was in order?

The CHAIRMAN ruled it not to be in order until that part of the bill was reached in which it was proposed to be inserted.

The reading of the bill now proceeded. At the end of page 17, Mr. BRONSON moved to insert the following proviso to that part of the bill appropriating to the contingent fund of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Resolved, however, That no part of this appropriation shall be applied by the marshal of the District of Columbia, or any other officer, to pay the clerk of the Supreme Court for copies of records of suits pending before the Supreme Court in which the United States are interested; and that, hereafter, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the said court to furnish the Attorney General, or other counsel of the United States, the necessary printed copies of records in suits pending in said court in which the United States are interested, without charge or compensation therefor.

Mr. ADAMS was understood to say that the proposed amendment was out of order, as it went to alter a standing law in an appropriation bill, and also on the ground that a similar proposition had been already rejected by the House.

Mr. BRONSON complained of certain practices of the Clerk in charging the Government for printed copies of papers which had been printed and already paid for by the United States; and contended that it was an abuse which had grown up, and ought to be put an end to. He believed there was no law upon the subject.

After some further remarks by Mr. ADAMS to prove the amendment out of order,

Mr. CAMBRELENG said it was competent to amend the bill to limit the object of a certain appropriation, and referred to various precedents where the committee had sanctioned that course. He said the money appropriated to meet the expenses of suits, &c., had been erroneously and corruptly applied, and the amendment to restrict it to its legitimate application was right and proper.

The CHAIRMAN decided that the amendment was in order.

Mr. BYNUM obtained the floor, and, wishing to reply to the remarks of Mr. KENNEDY, it being late in the day, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. TURNEY wished the committee, by consent, to take up the bill to pay for horses taken from certain volunteers in the Florida war by order of their officers; but the committee refused to take it up.

The committee then rose—ayes 80, noes 45—and reported.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 20, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the chief of the topographical bureau, with accompanying documents, made in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, on the subject of the operations for increasing the depth of water at the mouth of the Mississippi; which,

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the president of the convention lately held of the people of Florida, for the purpose of forming a constitution and State government; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of the Screw Dock Company of the city of New York, praying permission to import, free of duty, certain iron to be used in the construction of their dock; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LYON presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives in Congress, to use their best exertions to procure the passage of a law allowing them to locate other lands in lieu of those granted them for their university, and which have been claimed as preemptions by actual settlers; also instructing them to endeavor to procure the passage of a law continuing the preemption rights of deceased settlers to their widows and children; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. L. also presented a joint resolution of the same, on the subject of an appropriation for building a light-house and pier; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of sundry citizens of the northwestern part of Missouri, praying for the establishment of a new land office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Geauga county, Ohio, on the subject of the neutrality law of last session.

Mr. A. said these citizens complain of the severe provisions of that law, and of the manner in which they have been executed. They also complain of the destruction of the Caroline and her crew by British soldiers, acting under the authority of the British flag. They express the opinion that that was an outrage which the dignity and honor of this country require should be answered for. They desire the repeal or essential modification of the neutrality act, and that such measures may be taken by our Government as would efface the stain inflicted by the burning of the Caroline. He had heretofore presented several memorials on that subject, which had been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and he asked that this memorial might take the same direction.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations accordingly.

Mr. NORVELL presented the joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, asking an appropriation for the construction of a steam revenue cutter to navigate the lakes of Erie, St. Clair, and Huron; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS presented several petitions from citizens of Ohio, all praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and moved that they be received.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the motion to receive them was laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois on the subject of the establishment of a surveyor general's office in that State; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Reynell Coates, who states that he was one of those selected for the scientific corps to be attached to the exploring expedition, and relinquished a profitable business for that purpose; but by the final arrangements he was left out, and asked for remuneration; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial from merchants, mechanics, and traders of the city of Philadelphia, for the erection of a new custom-house in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FULTON presented a memorial from the Legislature of Arkansas, praying for the passage of a general preemption law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, two memorials on the subject of military roads; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Henry Lucas and A. P. King, asking for the value of property taken from them by the officer commanding a detachment of regular troops on their march to Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of Jean Baptiste Coms, praying permission to locate two hundred arpens of land in lieu of the same quantity of which he has been deprived by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which the same had been referred, reported the bill No. 335 from the House, with an amendment; which was read.

Also reported, without amendment, the bills from the House for the relief of John Dawson, Polly Leonard, Henry Stoker, and William Walker.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act for the relief of the heirs of Francis Jarvis, deceased;

An act for the relief of John Bovey, of Arkansas;

An act for the relief of David Ballentine;

An act for the relief of Thomas M. Burland;

An act for the relief of the children and heirs of Sebastian Scroufe, late of Ohio, deceased;

An act for the relief of Robert M. Roberts, or his legal representatives;

An act to grant to the counties of Lee, Des Moines, Jackson, and Dubuque, in the Territory of Iowa, land to aid in erecting county buildings.

Also, an act for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of George C. Withers, with an amendment.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill making grants of public lands to certain States for purposes of internal improvements, reported the same without amendment.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of certain citizens of Warsaw, Missouri, asking the establishment of an additional land office.

Mr. LINN observed, that in consideration of the lateness of the session, he did not object to the motion; but he should take the earliest opportunity at the next session of pressing this subject on the attention of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making appropriations for certain military and geographical surveys; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill from the House making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839, reported the same without amendment, and gave notice that he would call up the bill at an early hour to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of the widow of John R. Shaw, late a purser in the Navy, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. RIVES, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas B. Parsons; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

JAIL FOR WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the bill to provide for the erection of a new jail for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. BAYARD, NILES, MORRIS, CALHOUN, WRIGHT, and KING, the bill was, by general consent, laid on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TALLMADGE, on leave, introduced a bill to authorize the canceling of certain debenture bonds on the exportation of coal; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. HUBBARD, on leave, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Pearson Cogswell, late marshal of New Hampshire; which was read twice, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPEAL OF SALT DUTY.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the resolution to print certain documents in relation to the salt duty was taken up and adopted.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers with elections was taken up; and Mr. CUTHBERT addressed the Senate at some length, and with great force and ability, in opposition to the bill; after which it was passed over informally, Mr. CALHOUN giving notice of his intention to address the Senate on the subject.

MRS. MIRA ALEXANDER.

The Senate then took up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Mira Alexander, on its third reading, and, after a debate, in which it was supported by Messrs. CRITTENDEN, WALKER, LINN, and WHITE, and opposed by Messrs. NILES, CALHOUN, PIERCE, HUBBARD, and KING, the question was taken; and the bill was decided to be rejected—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, Linn, Merriek, Norvell, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Rugles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Walker, Webster, White, and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Morris, Monton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Swift, Wall, Williams of Maine, and Wright—19.

The vote having been announced,

Mr. TALLMADGE rose and said that he had voted in the majority, and his name did not appear on the Journals as having voted at all, and desired to have the Journal corrected.

Mr. WRIGHT and several other Senators declared that they had distinctly heard the Senator from New York answer to his name, voting in the affirmative.

A discussion then ensued, in which the propriety of making this correction was involved, Messrs. CALHOUN and HUBBARD contending that the vote having been announced, the subject was passed from the Senate; while Messrs. WALKER, TALLMADGE, WEBSTER, and others, contended that it was the duty of the Chair to correct the error the instant that it was discovered.

Mr. KING suggested that the correction could be made by the unanimous consent of the Senate, and hoped that this course would be taken.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. WALKER, KING, WRIGHT, CLAY of Alabama, TALLMADGE, SMITH of Indiana, DAVIS, and SMITH of Connecticut.

The decision was then unanimously made by the Senate that the vote should be corrected.

The name of Mr. TALLMADGE was again called, who answered "ay."

The VICE PRESIDENT then announced the vote as standing 19 in the affirmative and 19 in the negative; and, after a feeling and interesting eulogy on the services and character of George Madison, gave his casting vote in favor of the bill.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 20, 1839.

Mr. PARKER resumed his remarks on the report of the select committee on the public lands, and in opposition to the distribution scheme proposed by Mr. ROBERTSON, going at large into a variety of statements demonstrating the inequality of that measure upon the old States. Mr. P. having concluded,

Mr. YELL obtained the floor, and delivered his views on the subject. Mr. Y. said he occupied what he termed a middle ground between Mr. HARRISON and Mr. ROBERTSON. In reference to the proposition of the former, his State had signed the contract with the General Government; and whether she had made a bad bargain or not, she would abide by it, and ever would do so, as far as he had any influence, though he would not say Mr. H.'s resolution was wrong in the abstract. Mr. Y. then went into a general reply to Mr. ROBERTSON; and, without concluding, gave way for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a copy of a communication addressed to that office by the Executive of the State of Illinois, on the 4th instant, inclosing a copy of a preamble and resolutions passed by the Legislature of that State at its present session, setting forth the importance of establishing a surveyor general's office within that State.

On motion of Mr. CASEY, the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to which the bill upon that subject had been committed, and it was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CASEY renewed his request to the House for permission to submit the resolutions presented by him on Saturday last, in relation to the non-selection of the banks of Illinois as depositories of the public funds.

Mr. PETRIKIN said there were too many "whereases" by four in this proposition, and he therefore objected to its reception.

Mr. CASEY then, for the second time in his life, must move a suspension of the rules; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. DOWNING, on leave, presented the proceedings of the convention of Florida for the formation of a State constitution; which was laid on the table, and five thousand extra copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. TURNEY made an ineffectual effort to call up the bill to revive the act to pay for horses lost in the Florida war.

Mr. NAYLOR asked leave to make a report from the select committee appointed to investigate the conduct of Commodore Elliott, while commanding in the Mediterranean.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, objecting, Mr. N. moved a suspension of the rules; lost—87 to 50; not two thirds.

Mr. CONNOR, on leave, moved the withdrawal of the papers in relation to the claim before the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House again went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair.)

The question immediately pending was the motion of Mr. BRONSON to limit the appropriation of money for the contingent expenses of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BYNUM addressed the committee at length in reply to Mr. KENNEDY's speech of yesterday, and went into a general defense of the administration of General Jackson, from the assaults of that gentleman. As soon as Mr. B. had got through,

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS obtained the floor, and on his motion the committee rose and reported.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the War Department in relation to the investigations had by the commissioners under the resolution of July 1, 1836, upon the sales of the reservations of deceased Creek Indians.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, February 19, 1839.

BILLS PASSED.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, the three following bills were taken up, read a third time, and passed:

A bill making provision for a court-house in Duval county, Florida;

A bill granting to the judge of the supreme court of Iowa the same compensation as by law is given to the judges of the supreme court of Wisconsin; and

A bill making a donation of land to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of erecting public buildings thereon.

LAW LIBRARY FOR FLORIDA.

An act making an appropriation for purchasing a law library for the use and benefit of the Legislative Council and court of appeals of the Territory of Florida, was taken up, on the motion made on the 12th of February to reconsider the vote by which it was rejected.

The bill was opposed by Messrs. STANLEY and HALSTED, and briefly advocated by Mr. BRONSON.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, upon which motion the vote was—ayes 60, noes 58; no quorum.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 21, 1839.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting the annual statement of contracts made by that office; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. NORVELL presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, asking for an appropriation for the construction of a marine hospital at Detroit; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PIERCE presented the memorial of George Gates and others, legal voters of the town of Antrim, New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District.

Mr. P. said that the memorial came to him, accompanied by a letter from a highly respectable clergyman, residing in his native county. The letter says:

"Though we are aware that your views may not correspond with those of the petitioners, they have no doubt of your readiness to present a respectful petition, coming from any portion of the citizens of New Hampshire."

It is certainly no task to present the memorial; and yet I cannot, in justice to my own convictions of duty, comply with the request without expressing my deep regret that these petitioners, many of whom I am sure are actuated by pure motives, should so far mistake their own moral responsibilities, and the power and duty of Congress in relation to this subject.

I do earnestly hope that every honest man who has sincerely at heart the best interests of the slave and the master, may no longer be governed by a blind zeal and impulse, but be led to examine this subject, so full of delicacy and danger, in all its bearings; and that, when called upon to lend their names and influence to the cause of agitation, they may remember that we live under a written Constitution, which is the panoply and protection of the South, as well as the North—that it covers the entire Union, and is equally a guarantee for the unmolested enjoyment of the domestic institutions of all its parts; and, I trust, further, that they will no longer close their eyes to the fact that, so far as those in whose welfare they express so much feeling are concerned, this foreign interference has been, and must inevitably continue to be, evil, and only evil. Having, on a former occasion, expressed my views somewhat at length, I will not detain you further than to notice an erroneous statement which has been made, and a thousand times repeated, with regard to my own course and that of the representatives of New Hampshire in both Houses of Congress. We have been charged with having denied the right of petition; and, although the charge is wholly without foundation, I have no doubt that, from its frequent repetition, it may have had an influence upon the minds of many honest and patriotic men. So far from having denied, we have uniformly asserted and maintained this right. But after declamation and argument had been exhausted on both sides of the question; after the memorials had been referred to a select committee during the Twenty-Fourth Congress, and an elaborate report sent forth to the American people—we thought it our duty to take such a course with petitions of this character as would enable Congress to proceed with the consideration of subjects of necessary and legitimate legislation. The whole question since that period has been one with regard to the disposition of memorials when received; and no denunciation or false representations will drive us from a course demanded alike by a regard for the proper and necessary legislation of Congress, the rights of the South, and the interests of the whole country. After the declarations which have come from high sources during the present session, in both ends of the Capitol, I am encouraged to hope that the agitation of this question in New England for political purposes will cease; that there will be no more attempts to deceive and excite the people by inculcating the impression that their right to petition has been invaded.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the question of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the memorial of upwards of one thousand citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying for the repeal or modification of the naturalization laws; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from sundry pilots of the river Delaware and shipmasters of the port of Philadelphia, in relation to the harbor of Chester; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALL presented a petition of citizens of the State of New Jersey, praying for the erection of a light-house at Little Egg harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of a number of citizens of the town of Burlington, Illinois, praying for the establishment of a new post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported unfavorably on several bills from the House that had been referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Thomas H. Perkins, of Boston, on the ground that there are no documents on the files of this or the other House in support of the claim.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill making appropriations for the erection of public buildings in Florida, and the bill to revive and extend the act authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred an act for the relief of the representatives of Ann Levacher Van Brun, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of Joseph Shaw, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which the subject of claims for depredations in Florida had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James Williams, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred an act for the relief of the settlers upon the Salt Lick reservation in the western district of Tennessee, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation against their passage:

An act for the relief of Gideon Sheldon;
An act for the relief of the executors of Robert McFarland; and

An act granting a pension to John F. Wiley.
Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported an act granting a pension to John Clark, without amendment.

DEATH OF EDWARD WIER.

Mr. KING said he rose to present a resolution in consequence of the melancholy death this morning of one of the officers of the Senate, (Mr. Edward Weir.) But yesterday, (said Mr. K.,) he was among us, discharging his duties apparently in good health and spirits—to-day he had passed that bourn from whence no traveler returns. He would not dwell on the faithful services of this officer while he was among us; they were well known to the members of this body. He rose simply to present a resolution that the Senate would attend the funeral of their deceased officer, at half past three o'clock to-morrow, and that the expenses of his funeral be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The resolution was read, and unanimously agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the Senate went into executive session, and after a short time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General be directed to report to the Senate what drafts on banks having public funds on deposit have been protested since the 1st day of January, 1837; the amount of public money in deposit in each bank at the time of each protest; and whether, in any case, such protests have been made in violation of special arrangements, and, if so, what those arrangements were.

OWNERS OF THE ALLEGHANY.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the owners of the ship Alleghany was ordered to be laid upon the table—ayes 21, noes 14.

SECURITY OF THE PUBLIC MONEY.

The bill for securing the public money in the hands of collectors and agents of the Government, and the punishment of defaulters, was taken up on its third reading; and, after some remarks from Messrs. WEBSTER, HUBBARD, and WILLIAMS of Maine,

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, submitted a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, for the purpose of having it amended so as to embrace the principles of Mr. RIVES's substitute; and, after some remarks from Mr. C. and Mr. WRIGHT, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Foster, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, Walker, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—25.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. TALLMADGE and NILES; and the question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 15; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, and White—15.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, the title of the bill was so amended as to read, A bill further to prescribe the duties of collectors of the customs and other officers and agents in the employment of the United States, prohibiting the admission of certain offsets in suits against the debtors of the Government, and to provide for the punishment of public defaulters.

The bill entitled "A bill in amendment of the acts respecting the judicial system of the United States;" and

The bill to authorize the selection of lands for the benefit of the University of Michigan, instead of other lands heretofore selected;

The bill to repeal certain acts respecting Navy pensions, and making further provisions in relation to Navy pensions; and

The bill to authorize the Washington County and St. Genevieve Railroad Company, in the State of Missouri, to construct a road through the public lands, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act passed the 30th of June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States Marine Corps, was taken up and discussed by Messrs. RIVES, and WILLIAMS of Maine; and, without coming to any action thereon,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 21, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read, The SPEAKER announced the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, said he rose to a question of privilege, which would take precedence over all other business, and he would offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House proceed to inquire: 1. Whether ALEXANDER DUNCAN, a member of this House from the State of Ohio, be the author of a certain publication or publications, under his name, in relation to the proceedings of this House, and certain members thereof, published in the Globe newspaper of the 19th instant. 2. Whether, by said publication or publications, the said ALEXANDER DUNCAN has not been guilty of a violation of the privileges of this House, of an offense against its peace, dignity, and good order; and of such grossly indecent, ungentlemanly, disgraceful, and dishonorable misconduct, as renders him unworthy of his seat in this House, and justly liable to expulsion from the same.

Mr. YELL inquired if he was not entitled to the floor on the report of the select committee on the public lands?

The SPEAKER replied that he was, but that a question of privilege overrode everything else.

Mr. YELL asked the gentleman to postpone his motion until the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, said he could not consent to do so. Mr. P. said, that as this was a very important question, he would move a call of the House.

The call was ordered nem. diss.

On the first call of the roll one hundred and twenty-five members answered to their names, others having meanwhile come in, and one hundred and forty-six were announced as being present.

The doors were then closed, the absentees again called, and excuses rendered. After some time,

On motion of Mr. HALSTED, the call was dispensed with.

The publication in the Globe of the 19th instant was then read at the Clerk's table.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, then proceeded to comment at length upon the language used by Mr. DUNCAN, stating that, in doing so, he should consider the publication as a forgery and a false libel, and not regard it, for the honor of the House, as authentic.

Mr. DUNCAN interposed, and said he would save the trouble of proof. I say, sir, that I am the author of that publication, and of every word contained in it.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi replied, however, he should still proceed to comment upon the language as if the avowal had not been made; and he went on to contend that its use merited expulsion, or some potent mode of exemplifying the indignation of the House. Either under the code of honor, or the legal code, he was equally unworthy of a seat there; and Mr. P. argued both these positions at large.

Mr. JENIFER followed on the same side, and appealed to the advocates of the anti-dueling law to sustain the affirmative of the proposition before the House; for he insisted that Mr. DUNCAN's conduct had rendered him amenable to that law. Moreover, Mr. J. contended, also, that those who had certified to the fact of the time occupied by Mr. STANLY in his reply, were equally guilty, if their object was the same as Mr. D.'s. In reference to Mr. S.'s printed speech, he maintained that the gist of it was uttered on the floor, though the delivered speech was, in the opinion of himself, and thirty or forty members besides, more violent than the published one.

Mr. J. inquired if the gentleman from Ohio had so insulted the gentleman from North Carolina as to be evident to every one within hearing, would not the Chair have called him to order?

Mr. CONNOR, who had temporarily occupied the chair at the period referred to, explained that he had called Mr. DUNCAN to order.

Mr. JENIFER asked the gentleman whether he considered it a personal insult?

Mr. CONNOR had called the gentleman to order for disorderly language; but whether it was a personal insult or not did not fall within his consideration.

Mr. JENIFER having concluded,

Mr. DUNCAN obtained the floor, and addressed the House at some length in explanation, going to show that the language used toward him fully warranted his own in retort.

Mr. GRAY, after a few remarks, which will be given with the debate, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. TILLINGHAST demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 83, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allan, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Cray, Cushman, De Graff, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farrington, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Holsey, Holt, Howard, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Owens, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Potter, John H. Prentiss, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Spencer, Swearingen, Thomas, Titus, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William R. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grennell, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hoffman, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Legare, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Sampson, Mason, Maury, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Pearce, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shields, Sibley, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—91.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative; and the debate was further continued by Messrs. MENEFEE, PRENTISS of Mississippi, and GRAY.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, offered a resolution, in substance, as a modification of the one first introduced, "That, as ALEXANDER DUNCAN had avowed himself the author of the publication in the Globe, (naming the article,) he be and is hereby expelled the House."

Mr. LEGARE suggested the propriety of the gentleman moving it in the form of an inquiry.

Mr. ADAMS said, as an inquiry he might be prepared to vote for it, but the substitute involved a question as to the constitutional power of this House to expel a member.

Mr. PRENTISS then, as it did not appear to meet the approbation of his friends, withdrew it.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. PRENTISS of Mississippi, GRAY, WISE, and PARRIS, who moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and upon that motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a call of the House; which was not ordered.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Cray, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hale, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Holsey, Holt, Howard, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Montgomery, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, John H. Prentiss, Reilly, Richardson, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Shepler, Spencer, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toncey, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William R. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grennell, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Legare, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Peck, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Randolph, Kencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—101.

So the House refused to lay it upon the table.

The debate was further continued by Messrs.

TOUCEY, WISE, and GRAY.

Mr. THOMPSON obtained the floor, and moved the following as a substitute for the original resolution:

Resolved, That ALEXANDER DUNCAN, a member of this House, having avowed himself the author of an article published in the Globe of the 19th instant, grossly libelous of honorable members of this body, the said ALEXANDER DUNCAN be reprimanded by the Speaker in the presence of the House.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. THOMPSON and GLASCOCK; when,

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 22, 1839.

As soon as the Journal was read,
Mr. ROBINSON rose and said: Mr. President, I present, and ask to have read and printed, two joint resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois—the first, that it is not the true policy of the United States to establish an Independent or sub-Treasury system; the second, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of the State in Congress to vote against the adoption of any such system. With the greatest respect and most profound deference for the opinion of the majority of the Legislature whose vote passed the resolutions, the system they reject, so far at least as keeping the public money is concerned, is, in my humble opinion, not only the true, but the best policy; and it is my firm conviction that such is the decided opinion of a majority of the voters of Illinois, and such I take to be their unqualified expression, as evinced last August in the result of the election for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and members to Congress. Yet it is possible I may be mistaken, and it is not for me to go behind the instructions; that is an account those who give them have to settle. If they were elected to give them, or their constituents are for them, they have done right; if neither, the instructors will be instructed. I have only to add, my political creed forbids disregard to the legitimate instructions from the body whose voice honored me with a seat here. Their will, not mine, be done, and upon them rest the responsibility.

The resolutions were then read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. observed, whilst up, he would also present a joint resolution of the same Legislature, containing instructions to the Senators and a request to the Representatives of the State to use their best exertions to have the Constitution so amended as, after the 4th of March, 1845, no person shall hold the office of President of the United States longer than four years in any term of eight years; which he also moved be read and printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Erie county, New York, praying that wheat may be imported from Canada free of duty, for the purpose of being manufactured into flour and exported; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a memorial from William Dickinson, of the Territory of Wisconsin, asking remuneration for losses sustained on contracts; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. YOUNG presented three petitions from citizens of Warren, McLean, and Tazewell counties, Illinois, praying for the establishment of mail routes; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented a petition from Samuel T. Harrison, praying the refundment of certain duties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred an act to incorporate the Washington Manual Labor Society, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred a resolution of the Senate instructing them to inquire into the propriety of making appropriation for defenses on the northeastern frontier, reported a bill for the erection of certain military defenses in the State of Maine; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of George G. Johnston, reported it without amendment, and with a recommendation against its passage.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred a memorial of Henry Hall Sherwood, on the subject of electro-magnetism, made a report thereon; which was read, and five thousand extra copies of the report and memorial ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. KING, on leave, and in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill for the relief of John H. Jacobs; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to fix the minimum price of lands acquired by Miami treaty of November 6, 1838;

The bill for the relief of Samuel Collins; and

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy; were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JAIL IN WASHINGTON.

The bill for the erection of a jail in Washington county, District of Columbia, was taken up for consideration, and several amendments proposed by Mr. BAYARD were adopted.

Mr. NILES offered a substitute for the bill; which, after some remarks from Messrs. BAYARD, NILES, and ALLEN, was rejected—ayes 5, noes 24.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—ayes 19, noes 14.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

The act to authorize the selection of lands for the benefit of the University of Michigan, instead of other lands heretofore selected, and for other purposes;

The act to amend the judicial system of the United States;

The act to repeal certain acts in respect to Navy pensions, and to make further provision in relation to Navy pensions;

The act granting to the Washington County and St. Genevieve Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands; and

The act for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Bulow—ayes 19, noes 16.

JOSEPH M. HERNANDEZ.

The act for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez was taken up for consideration; and, after being discussed by Messrs. NILES, WRIGHT, CRITTENDEN, and BAYARD, was amended on motion of Mr. WRIGHT; and it was then ordered to a third reading.

OPERATIONS OF THE MINT.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate such information as he may possess, as to the following particulars:

1. The amount of coin made at the Mint, and the amount at each of its branches, for one year preceding the first day of February last.
2. The amount of bullion deposited at, or obtained for, each establishment for the same time.
3. The expense incurred in carrying on and in sustaining each establishment during the same time.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections was then taken up, and Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was then informally passed over.

CITIZENS IN OREGON.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the bill to provide for the protection of the citizens of the United States residing in the Oregon Territory, or trading on the Columbia river, was taken up.

Mr. LINN addressed the Senate at length in explanation and support of the bill; and, after a further debate, in which Messrs. LINN, NILES, and WRIGHT participated, the subject was, on the motion of the latter, passed over informally, with the understanding that it be taken up tomorrow.

RAILROAD IN ILLINOIS.

The bill to grant to the State of Indiana a quantity of land for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from New Albany to Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 22, 1839.

The privileged question on the publication of Mr. DUNCAN, as stated in yesterday's proceedings, was again resumed.

Mr. PETRIKIN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House as follows, in explanation of the motives inducing him to make the motion with which he concluded: I rise, not to make a speech, or to take sides in this war. It matters not what my individual opinions are of members of this House in their individual relations. I am here not to gratify my own private pique against others, or to gratify my own private feelings at the expense of duty to my constituents and the country generally. I disclaim any intention to express an opinion on the merits of the case now before the House, but I must be allowed to give my opinion of the scene enacted within this Hall yesterday. We were called upon to inquire into the conduct of one of the members of this House, on an alleged breach of privilege, for printing and publishing an alleged libel on other members; and in discussing the propriety of passing those resolutions, a scene has been enacted, in my opinion, and I believe the country will consider it so, infinitely more a breach of the privilege of the members of this House, than that alleged to be perpetrated by the accused member, even if that be as great an outrage as those complaining of it allege. We have, by law, but seven days to do the business of the country—to furnish the supplies for the necessary operations of Government; and shall we, regardless of our duties, spend that time in idle debate? I intended to have made my remarks last evening; but, on reflection, I thought there was too much excitement. I hope all are cool now, and ready to do their duty, and I therefore move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. P., however, withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. ELMORE.

Mr. THOMPSON sent to the table the following substitute, which Mr. PRENTISS accepted as a modification:

Whereas, ALEXANDER DUNCAN, a member of this House from the State of Ohio, has, in his place, acknowledged himself to have written, and caused to be published in the Globe newspaper, of the 19th instant, the following writing, to wit:

[FOR THE GLOBE.]

On the 16th and 17th January last, I made some remarks in the House of Representatives on the resolution to appoint a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, which remarks were soon after published in the Globe, and have since been published in pamphlet form. Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, followed me in reply. At the commencement of his remarks, he insinuated that I was an Abolitionist. I promptly pronounced the insinuation a base falsehood, and a foul detraction, whether it dwelt upon the lips of the unprincipled calumniator, or floated on the breeze in the corrupt, poisonous, and slanderous Federal sheets of the day. My intention at the time was to insult the member. So he understood me. So all who heard me understood me. My meaning was that the member was a base liar and a foul calumniator; and the only reason that he was indirectly thus denounced, was because the rules of the House prohibited me from doing it directly, without laying myself liable to its censure. All this, too, was well understood at the time; and for this intended and well-understood insult, I held myself in readiness to give the member any satisfaction which he might have the moral courage to seek. But no disposition to seek for redress was manifested within the time I had a right to expect it, or within the time it might be expected from a man who had any regard for his honor or reputation. So I was disposed to let the member go for, what I believe him to be, a mean poltroon and a base liar; and which I believe he may at any time, and in any place, be pronounced with impunity.

Some ten or twelve days after making the remarks to which I allude, I saw a communication in the National Intelligencer, occupying the space of four or five columns of that paper, purporting to be "the reply of Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, to Dr. DUNCAN." I was surprised to see a reply of such length. I was not present all the time the member was speaking. I was present, as I have stated, when he commenced. I was present when he finished, and his last remark was, "I have detained the House not more than fifteen minutes." I thought he was correct as to the time he occupied the floor—(a short time in which to make a speech occupying four and a half columns of one of the largest newspaper sheets.)

Leave is sometimes asked of the House to write out a speech which there may not be time to make, and the privilege is generally granted. This is an accommodation to the House, and to the country, whose business is permitted to progress. But, in all cases of this kind, leave of the House ought to be obtained, and a notice of the fact ought to accompany the written speech. It is mean and basely dishonorable, and it is a falsehood and a fraud practiced upon the community, to promulgate a speech purporting to have been delivered on the floor of Congress which never was there spoken, on any other conditions than by the leave and with the notice which I have named.

I say that the speech published in the National Intelligencer of the 4th instant, purporting to be "the remarks of Mr. STANLY in reply to Dr. DUNCAN," never was delivered in the House of Representatives, nor any other place, except through the polluted columns of the corrupt, bank-bought, servile, and degraded sheet through which it makes its appearance; therefore, its very caption or title contains a base falsehood, and a mean attempt at fraud and imposition upon the public. Its whole body is a tissue of misrepresentations, unmanly insinuations, and low vulgarity, worthy of the man that can be charged with base falsehood and foul detraction with impunity. In order to know that I could not be mistaken as to the time the member occupied in his attempt to reply to me, and to ascertain some other facts of which I will soon speak, I addressed the following notes to the gentlemen whose names are prefixed, to which I received the subjoined answers:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 9, 1839.

SIR: If you were present on the 17th of January, 1839, when Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, replied to some remarks made by me on the resolution to appoint a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, will you have the goodness to state what time Mr. STANLY occupied in making his reply? Whether Mr. SLADE, of Vermont, did or did not hand him (STANLY) a paper containing my answer to some abolition interrogatories, and whether Mr. SLADE did or did not point out to Mr. STANLY such passages of said answer as Mr. STANLY exhibited in his reply.

Your attention to this will much oblige your friend,
A. DUNCAN.
Hon. H. L. TURNER.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February —, 1839.

SIR: I have received your note of the 9th of this month, and in answer thereto have the honor to state that I was in my seat in the House of Representatives on the 17th of January last. I heard your speech delivered in the House on that day on the subject to which you refer, and the reply thereto of the Hon. Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, on the same day. I did not tax my recollection with the precise time occupied by Mr. STANLY in making his reply, but my impression is it did not exceed fifteen or twenty minutes.

In the course of Mr. STANLY's remarks, I understood him to make allusions to a letter which he alleged had been written by you on the subject of abolitionism. He regretted that he had not the letter to read to the House. In a few seconds after this, my attention was directed to Mr. STANLY by some gentlemen who sat near me, and who called my attention to the fact, that Mr. SLADE was prompting Mr. STANLY, by pointing out to him certain parts of your letter, to be read by him to the House. I have no knowledge how or from whom Mr. STANLY received the letter above referred to.

I am, sir, respectfully yours, &c.,
H. L. TURNER,
Hon. A. DUNCAN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 9, 1839.

SIR: Were you in the House on the 17th January, 1839, when I made some remarks on the resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, or were you present when Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, replied to me? If so, will you be so good as to state, first, if Mr. SLADE, of Vermont, did or did not hand him (STANLY) a paper containing my letter in answer to some abolition interrogatories? Second, state whether Mr. SLADE did or did not stand by him (STANLY) and prompt or point out such passages of said letter as were exhibited in his reply? Third, will you state what time STANLY occupied in his reply, and whether or not the greater portion of that time was occupied in reading portions of the letter above alluded to?

Your attention to this will much oblige, yours, &c.,
A. DUNCAN.
Hon. J. A. BYNUM.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 10, 1839.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 9th instant, and the questions therein contained, I can only say that I was present and heard the concluding part of your remarks on the occasion alluded to; after which, I saw Mr. STANLY rise, and heard his reply.

I did not see Mr. SLADE hand Mr. STANLY the paper containing your letter on the subject of abolition. Mr. SLADE has informed me since, however, that he did hand Mr. STANLY such a paper at the time alluded to by you.

While Mr. S. was speaking, I saw Mr. SLADE standing by or behind Mr. STANLY, pointing, as I thought, at different paragraphs in the paper held by Mr. S. As to the last question, I think I heard Mr. STANLY say, in concluding his few remarks, that he had not addressed the House more than fifteen minutes, and I think that about the time he did speak.

With respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
J. A. BYNUM.
Hon. A. DUNCAN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 9, 1839.

SIR: Were you in the House on the 17th January, when I made some remarks on the resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, or were you present during the time that Mr. STANLY replied to me? If so, will you be so good as to state the time, as near as possible, or as well as you can recollect, that he (STANLY) occupied in his reply? Your early answer will much oblige your friend,
A. DUNCAN.

Hon. Eli Moore.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 12, 1839.

SIR: In reply to the interrogatories contained in your communication of the 9th instant, I will state that I was in the House at the time referred to, and heard the remarks both of Mr. STANLY and yourself. The time occupied by Mr. S. in his reply to you did not, to the best of my recollection, exceed fifteen minutes.

Very respectfully,
ELY MOORE.
Hon. A. DUNCAN.

I think I am sustained in the fact which I have asserted, viz: that "the speech of Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, in reply to Dr. DUNCAN," &c., never was made in the House of Representatives, or, if made, must have been made in the short space of "fifteen minutes." But even all that time was not occupied in making the speech purporting to be the reply to "Dr. DUNCAN." When I charged upon the member a base falsehood, &c., for making the insinuation which he did, some part of the fifteen minutes was occupied in denying that he had insinuated that I was an Abolitionist. Here is where the member showed the white feather. That denial was but a squirming from under the responsibility of answering in an honorable way the charge of being guilty of base falsehood. A part of the balance of these precious fifteen minutes, (and a great part, too,) was occupied in reading garbled extracts from a letter which I wrote in answer to some Abolition interrogatories propounded to me shortly before my reelection. The member first regretted that he had not the letter in his possession; but it was soon furnished. Who furnished it? Mr. SLADE, of Vermont. Ah! Mr. SLADE, I am happy to meet you on this board of exposition. I have been talking all this time about (to use a vulgar phrase) "the little end of nothing;" a thing that requires the use of a telescope to see if it be at any considerable distance; hardly the ninth part of a man; a thing now out of time and out of place; a thing that the Almighty never intended for any other purpose than the use of bodkin, shears, and thimble. But you, sir, are a man six feet five in your shoes. I feel a freedom in talking to you; and, in order to have a full and ample case, I will splice the member from North Carolina to you, and for a short time will consider you one person, or in "cahoot," and in that capacity I will hold myself responsible to you for all I say.

You profess to be an Abolitionist; religiously, morally, patriotically, and civilly, a modern Abolitionist—even, so I have been told, to amalgamationism. You furnished the member from North Carolina, did you, with my answer to the Abolitionists, from which to read garbled extracts? You stood at his elbow, did you, prompting him, and pointing out suitable passages of my letter, to enable him to make an anti-abolition speech, and attach to my name that of abolitionism? Only think of this! A rank abolition Whig from the North in "cahoot with a rank anti-abolition Whig from the South, in exposing the pernicious doctrine contained in a letter which deprecates slavery in the abstract, or, rather, a northern abolition Whig making a convenience and a parrot of a southern anti-Abolitionist, through which to expose the dangerous tendencies of an expression of hostility to slavery in the abstract, and its effects, without regard to time or place! What base sophistry! What black hypocrisy! What political swindling for base and corrupt party purposes!

Yes, black hypocrisy, take it as you may. If I am an Abolitionist, why should the member from Vermont lend himself to make me odious to the slaveholding people? Or if the member from Vermont is sincere in his profession of abolitionism, why is he assisting and prompting an anti-Abolitionist to expose opinions of mine to the prejudice of the principles of his faith? If the member from North Carolina is sincere in his professions of anti-abolitionism, why does he permit himself to be made the tool of an avowed Abolitionist? All this unnatural connection is well understood. Abolitionism and Whiggery, like twin brothers, walk hand in hand here and everywhere else. There is not an ism on earth, however degraded, that Whiggery will not take by the hand. Here we have the evidence of the submission and acknowledgment into which the member from North Carolina was either kicked or coaxed by party discipline, evidenced by the following letter, by which the member from North Carolina is made publicly to retract a charge which he had made against the member from Vermont, and to declare publicly that he (STANLY) believes that the open, avowed, and reckless Abolitionist, [SLADE], "means no harm to the South." But read the letter. Here it is:

TO THE EDITORS.

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1838.

MESSRS. GALES & SEATON: In the Intelligencer of this morning, I find the following report:

"Mr. SLADE introduced the following resolution:

"Whereas, there exists and is carried on between the ports in the District of Columbia and other ports of the United States, and under the sanction of the laws thereof, a trade in human beings, whereby thousands of them are annually sold and transported from said District to distant parts of the country, in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States; and whereas, such trade involves an outrageous violation of human rights, is a disgrace to the country by whose laws it is sanctioned, and calls for the immediate interposition of legislative authority for its suppression: Therefore, to the end that all obstacles to the consideration of this subject may be removed and a remedy for the evil speedily provided,

"Resolved, That so much of the fifth of the resolutions on the subject of slavery, passed by this House on the 11th and 12th of the present month, as relates to 'the removal of slaves from State to State,' and prohibits the action of this House on 'every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching' the same, be, and hereby is, rescinded."

After which, it is reported that "Mr. DAWSON called for the reading of the resolution; which having been again read, Mr. STANLY said he wished to introduce an amendment. The Chair said it was not now in order, the resolution not yet being in the possession of the House."

When Mr. SLADE's resolution was read, and I heard the words "outrageous violation of human rights" and "disgraceful" applied, as I thought, to the slaveholding States, and to North Carolina as one of them, I could not repress the indignation I felt at such language. It was under the influence of this excitement that I wished to "introduce an amendment," when the "Chair said it was not now in order."

The amendment I wished to introduce was in the words following:

"Resolved, That said resolution is disrespectful in its language, and outrageously insulting to the representatives of the slaveholding States; that it is calculated to provoke and irritate the members from said States; and that the consideration of said resolution would be an 'outrageous violation' of the respect due to the slaveholding States, and would necessarily tend to weaken the bonds of our Union."

"Resolved, That said resolution is 'disgraceful' to the member who presents it, as it evinces a total disregard of the feelings of the representatives of the slaveholding States of this Union, and does not deserve to be considered by the House."

But the rules of order, different at different times, prevented me from introducing this amendment, and I do not now regret it, as the resolution was not considered by the House, and as I have been since satisfied that, though the language sounded harshly to the ears of a Representative from the South, nothing offensive was intended, and I write this note now, that my constituents may be informed what my amendment was; waiting for an hour of leisure, when I will inform them more fully why it was that I did not vote upon the resolutions recently offered by a member from New Hampshire.

I have good reasons for refusing to join in the miserable farce which has been played by the instruments of party in the House of Representatives during Tuesday and Wednesday last.

Oblige me by publishing this note.

Very respectfully, yours, EDWARD STANLY.

Comment on this letter, it would seem, is unnecessary. The resolution of the member from Vermont not only strikes at the root of every interest the southern States have in the institutions of slavery, but it uses the most degrading and abusive language that a foul tongue could express or a poisoned pen record; and so the member from North Carolina virtually expresses himself; but either from being whipped into the traces by force of party discipline, or from cowardice, unworthy a son of the South, whose heart ought to be in her interests, and her reputation his boast, he is forced to the degrading public acknowledgment that nothing offensive to the South was intended by the member from Vermont! I think, as the people of North Carolina will understand this matter, it is useless for me to expand upon it.

But a word in relation and in justice to myself. A few days prior to my reflection, several interrogatories were propounded to me on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and I, probably on the spur of the occasion, answered them without time for reflection or opportunity for examination; but I am to say that, on mature examination, I have not one word contained in that letter to take back, as it regards slavery in the abstract or abolitionism. When I wrote that letter I felt as I wrote. I wrote as I now feel, and as I hope always to feel, on the subject of slavery in the abstract, and as thousands and hundreds of thousands of the best men the world ever produced have thought, and now think, both in free and in slave States.

My remarks in that letter were made with reference to slavery in all time, present, past, and future, and without reference to any particular realm, kingdom, empire, or republic; and I now say, that the man who will otherwise express himself to this general view of the subject of slavery in the abstract, is no philanthropist, is no friend to human liberty, and would be unworthy the proud name of an American.

My objections to modern abolitionism are strongly expressed in the same letter. I there deprecate it as disorganizing in its tendencies, in violation of the compact by which the Union was brought into existence, and, if persisted in, will endanger its duration. My official course since has been in accordance with the view I then entertained of it. I voted to suspend the rule for the admission of Mr. ATRERTON's resolutions, for the object and contents of which I refer the reader to the Journals of the House of Representatives for the present session of Congress. A motion for adjournment was then made by Mr. BELL, at the early hour of half past one o'clock, p. m., evidently for the purpose of defeating the adoption of the resolutions. I voted against the adjournment; but the member from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] voted in favor of the adjournment. I voted throughout for the adoption of these resolutions, with the exception of the last division of the last resolution, which goes to prevent the reading, printing, and reference of petitions on the subject of abolitionism. This I thought impolitic, and well calculated to multiply petitions and petitioners on this vexed question, because such a disposition never fails to raise the cry of persecution. I also thought that such a disposition of petitions was a violation of the right of petition as secured by the Constitution; for, surely, to prevent and refuse legislative action upon them, is virtually to prostrate the right to petition. To recognize the right to petition Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, (which Congress does by receiving petitions for that purpose,) and at the same time, and by the same act, refuse them the usual legislative action, is worse than contemptuous mockery of the right to petition.

I hold that the people have a right to petition Congress for the redress of every grievance not forbidden by the Constitution. I hold that the people are, and of right ought to be, the judges of what they shall petition Congress for; and I hold it follows, as a corollary, that Congress is bound to give petitions the proper and usual direction, to the end that they may receive that legislative action which the framers of the Constitution intended they should, when they secured inviolate the right of petition. It seems to me that good policy and a sound interpretation of the Constitution require that such should be the disposition of all petitions.

I voted for Mr. ATRERTON's resolutions, because I thought the reserved and constitutional rights of the southern States demanded their adoption. I voted for them, because I thought the peace and quiet of the country required it. I voted for them, because, as I have before said, I think the practical operation of the principles of modern abolitionism would be more fatal to the unfortunate African than even slavery itself as it at present exists in the United States; and, therefore, I can consider modern abolitionism in no other light than as mistaken philanthropy. I voted for their adoption, because I am not clear that Congress has any such power over the District of Columbia as to abolish slavery within its limits. But above all, I voted for them, because I think the perpetuity of this Union, and the duration of our institutions required that they should all be adopted, with the exception of that part of the last resolution which I before excepted.

I say I stood by and sustained these resolutions, voting for them against all the efforts to defeat them by the Opposition; but where was the member from North Carolina at this trying moment? I have examined the Journals; the name of EDWARD STANLY is not to be found. Where was he, I ask, when the northern Democracy rallied almost to a man to put at rest a question that was shaking the institutions of his State from their center to their circumference, and endangering the very existence of the Union itself? I repeat, where was the member at this responsible crisis? Was he at his post, sustaining the interests of his State, which he said, on one occasion not long since, had "GROWN WITH HIS GROWTH! STRENGTHENED WITH HIS STRENGTH!" No, he was not at his post. He was, spaniel-like, skulking from his duty and his post, at the nod of party discipline; but, when backed and prompted by the Abolitionist, Slade, he assumed all the pertness of a whiffet, hissed on, puppy-like, to do that which a bigger dog had not the courage to attempt.

But to conclude, people of North Carolina, (for this paper may find its way to you,) what do you think of your Representative, who has attempted to practice a base fraud and a mean deception upon you, by promulgating a speech among you, purporting to have been delivered by him in the House of Representatives, which never was delivered, and though a disgrace—delivered or written—to any man but the member from North Carolina, he has neither the moral courage nor the talent to deliver? What do you think of your Representative, who has patiently stood to be charged with base falsehood and foul detraction with impunity, and who, to skulk from the responsibility of resenting such an insult, has basely denied that which every word written in that which he is pleased to call his speech bears evidence, thus adding, I repeat, base falsehood to mean cowardice? What do you think of your Representative, who has skulked from the support of measures (I mean ATRERTON's resolutions) introduced for the purpose of putting to rest that dangerous question, modern abolitionism, so eminently calculated to disturb the peace and harmony of this Union, and to prostrate or shake the institutions of the member's State, whose interests have "grown with his growth! and strengthened with his strength!"

But, above all, what do you think of your Representative, who has permitted himself to be made the tool, the cat's-paw, the thing, the automaton, and the parrot, through which an open and avowed Abolitionist should make an anti-abolition speech? An anti-abolition speech through your Representative! and that, too, by an Abolitionist! Yes; and, I believe, an amalgamation Abolitionist, too, a man who has spent or evaporated thousands of dollars on the floor of Congress in efforts to establish principles and laws subversive of your institutions, in violation of your reserved rights as a State, and disorganizing, if not destructive, to the Union; and so far as amalgamation is concerned, or is a part of his creed, degrading to the American character. This is the man from whom your Representative receives promptings, papers, and dictations, to fix upon me the character of an Abolitionist! and to expose the horrors, injustice, and dangers of modern abolitionism!

I conclude by saying, that if the speech in the Intelligence, which purports to be "the reply of Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, to Dr. DUNCAN" had been delivered, and had the member suspended the previous question which he held, and which he refused to suspend, this communication would have appeared in the form of a reply, which would have been made to all he really did say; but as it was, I thought it due to myself, to those who may read this paper, and to the cause of truth and justice, to make the above exposure.

Further this deponent saith not.

A. DUNCAN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 12, 1839.

SIR: In a letter written by me in answer to some interrogatories propounded to me on the subject of abolitionism, by a number of members of the anti-slavery society in the district I have the honor to represent, I deprecate slavery in the abstract; and I attempt, to some extent, to describe the effects it has upon the institutions and prospects of those countries and States where it exists. I also, in the same letter, deprecate modern abolitionism as dangerous and disorganizing, subversive of the reserved rights of the slave States, and calculated to endanger the Union, &c. All, in that letter, that I said in relation to slavery, was intended to apply to slavery in the abstract; also, to apply to slavery and its effects in all time—past, present, and future. I gave no locations. My objections and descriptions were of the most general character. I see in a speech published in the National Intelligencer, purporting to be a speech made by "Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, in reply to Dr. DUNCAN," &c., he is made to ask, in substance, if the ruin and desolation, &c., which I describe in the letter above-mentioned, applies to your district, &c.? You are made to respond, "No; it is a foul libel, a base slander upon my constituents and upon my State." If you made such a remark, I did not hear it, or I would have responded to it at the time. I presume you made it. Now, sir, if you read my letter, you must have seen that my objections to slavery have reference to slavery in the abstract, and applied to slavery, as I have before said, in all time; and my description of its effects had no location. You had no right to suppose that my description of the effects of slavery applied to your State, or your district, where it is well known, it is a matter of history creditable to your State, that slavery exists in its mildest and most unexceptionable form. I say, if you had read my letter, you would have had no grounds to warrant the remark you are said to have made. If you never read the letter, and know nothing of its contents, only from the base and unmanly manner in which its garbled fragments have been exhibited, you are wholly unjustifiable in your remark. You made the remark under the broad and protective shield of parliamentary privilege. You have not the moral courage to face me, or any other man, and make such a remark without the protection of such a privilege. It is a shield and privilege under which many a puppy, in man's shape, has taken refuge.

I think your remarks were unwarranted, uncalled for, and unprovoked. And, sir, on my own responsibility, and without claim to privilege, permit me, by way of offset and compromise, to reciprocate the remark by another, which I think better founded in truth—that is, that you are a liar and a scoundrel, and permit me to add, also, that, in my opinion, you are better qualified to adorn the gambler's board, the brothel, and the dogery, than the Halls of Congress.

A. DUNCAN.

TO WILLIAM SOUTHGATE, Esq.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 18, 1839.

SIR: In the remarks which I made in the House of Representatives on the 17th January, 1839, on the resolution to appoint a committee to investigate the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, I exposed the names of several Government defaulters, and the several amounts for which they were in default, and the offices which they held under which the defalcations occurred. In my expositions I was governed by the official reports and records of the different Government Departments. Among them I found the name of Robert B. Randolph, acting purser in the Navy, reported to be a defaulter to the amount of $25,000, or upwards. Since the publication of the remarks above referred to, I have seen a communication addressed to me through the Alexandria Gazette, (a paper published in the District of Columbia,) signed Robert B. Randolph, denying that he is a public defaulter, as he has vouchers to show, &c.

I hope the statement of Mr. Randolph is true. It will give me great uneasiness, if I have done him injustice. I have not the slightest acquaintance with Mr. Randolph, nor have I any practical knowledge of his defalcations whatever. If I have done him injustice in the exposition I have made, it will give me great pleasure to acknowledge my error in as public a manner as I have made the exposition. Will you have the goodness to inform me, without delay, what the relations of Mr. Randolph are with the Government in reference to the defalcations reported by your Department?

Respectfully, A. DUNCAN.
TO THE FOURTH AUDITOR.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 19, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, inquiring "what the relations of Mr. Robert B. Randolph are with the Government, in reference to the defalcations reported by the Treasury Department," and to state, in reply, that the account of Mr. Randolph, as acting purser of the frigate Constitution, was settled and closed in this office, in the month of October, 1828; that in February, 1833, he was recharged with items for which he had been erroneously credited in the previous settlement, amounting to $25,220 17; and that by a subsequent allowance for pay and rations to 19th April, 1833, the balance against him was reduced to $23,097 83, in which sum he appears, by the books of this office, still to be indebted to the United States.

I have the honor, sir, to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, A. O. DAYTON.

TO HON. ALEX. DUNCAN, House of Representatives.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 19, 1839.

SIR: If you were Fourth Auditor of the Treasury Department at the time Robert B. Randolph was purser in the Navy, will you have the goodness to state to me whether Mr. Randolph was, or was not, a public defaulter? If he was a defaulter, please state to what amount he so appeared. It is alike due to myself, as it is to Mr. Randolph, that this information should be furnished me. Will you please give it your immediate attention.

I am yours, with high respect, A. DUNCAN.
HON. A. KENDALL.

WASHINGTON, February 19, 1839.

SIR: I have just received your letter of this date. I was not Fourth Auditor at the time Robert B. Randolph was an acting purser in the Navy, nor did I settle his account for that service; but I settled the account of his predecessor in the pursership, who had died at sea; and in the course of that duty, discovered that Mr. Randolph had received a large sum of public money left by the deceased purser on board of his ship, with which he had never been charged, and other property, public and private, for which he did not appear to have accounted. The amount was accordingly charged to him on the books of the Fourth Auditor, where, I suppose, the charge still stands.

Mr. Randolph denied his indebtedness, alleging that he had paid away the money on account of his predecessor, and taken the vouchers in his name, but could produce no proof which would entitle him to credits in the accounting office. It was the opinion of a court of inquiry, called in his case, that he had applied a portion of the money in the way he alleged, and that he was justly indebted for the balance.

I write from memory, and cannot particularize.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

Hon. A. DUNCAN.

I have been induced to make the inquiries and exposures here exhibited, in consequence of the following communication:

To the Hon. A. Duncan, of Ohio.

In a speech which has been published, said also to have been delivered by you, in the House of Representatives, I find that you have classed me among the public defaulters. However much you may be in favor of abolition "in the abstract," I bog that hereafter you will not, in making use of my name, abolish the truth. I am no defaulter, as the documents in my possession will show. It may suit your creed, sir, to stand up in your place, and, with brazen front, defame honest and honorable men; but you shall not use your "privilege," where I am concerned, without receiving a proper contradiction. You have quite enough to do to defend the speculations and frauds of your political friends—those who steal millions and upstrokes for England, as well as those who steal thousands and remain at anchor here—without calumniating innocent persons. I therefore recommend to you a little caution in your future harangues.

R. B. RANDOLPH,

Late of the United States Navy.

ALEXANDRIA, January 29, 1839.

It was not from a spirit of resentment I have been induced to notice the above communication. No; I was led to notice it from a disposition to do Mr. Randolph justice and right, if I had done him an injury, although I think most readers will conclude, with me, that Mr. Randolph might have seen abundance of reason, in the following extract, to have desisted from the above communication. The extract is taken from the speech to which Mr. Randolph alludes, and was in answer to Mr. BELL, as the extract shows. When I was exposing the defalcation of the Messrs. Erwins, Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, rose, and said the Erwins were not defaulters; it was a slander promulgated by the Globe paper.

"Mr. DUNCAN responded, that he did not get the information from the Globe; he obtained it from the records in the archives of the Government—evidence of the highest character, and that which is open to the view of every one who desires to read. I hope (said Mr. D.) it is not true. I would prefer to conceal, at all times, human weakness and depravity, rather than expose, where it may be done without public injury; but I would prefer that such depravity as I am now exposing, did not exist. And let me say, once for all, that I know nothing personally of the numerous and wholesale frauds which I am now exposing. I am alike ignorant of the men whom the records show to be the perpetrators. These frauds, with the names of those who committed them, are matters of record, and the facts are spread over the whole country, and known to all who read the Journals of Congress and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. Consequently, my exposition can neither affect the reputation of those whose names I expose or the cause of justice."

I say the remarks contained in this extract might have well superseded the communication. But Mr. R. volunteers the following advice: "I therefore recommend to you a little caution in your future harangues." I return my thanks for this advice, and when I want more I will call for it. But Mr. R. is unkind in saying: "It may suit your creed, sir, to stand up in your place, and, with brazen front, defame honest and honorable men." I say this is an unkind charge—is unkind if it is intended to fix on me a claim of privilege in consequence of my representative character. I claim no privilege on that ground. I hold myself responsible for all I say, either in my personal or representative character. If, perchance, I am officially compelled to notice men and things in a manner unpleasant, and I am to be held responsible in my individual capacity, all I ask is that he be a gentleman who so holds me. I want him to have clean hands. He must be such a one whose frauds have not been such as to place him out of time and out of place when he is without the gloomy walls of a degrading penitentiary. He must not have the base and degraded character of coward united to his reputation in life and to his memory in death, by having pulled the nose of an old patriot, withered and bleached by the frosts of seventy winters, and worn to the brink of the grave by services to his country.

A. DUNCAN.

Therefore,

Resolved, That the said ALEXANDER DUNCAN has, in the premises, subjected himself to the just censure of this House; and that he be reprimanded therefor by the Speaker, in the presence of the House.

Mr. ELMORE then gave his reasons at length why he should sustain this motion. Mr. E. having, as requested by the original mover, renewed the motion,

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked Mr. PETRIKIN to substitute a demand for the previous question; but Mr. P. declined.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the House; which was agreed to—yeas 88, noes 69.

After the call was proceeded in till two hundred and sixteen members were ascertained to be present.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, it was further dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, (Mr. PETRIKIN having again temporarily withdrawn the pending motion) briefly assigned the reasons why he should vote to lay on the table.

The motion having been renewed by Mr. W., the vote thereon was—yeas 117, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Boers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farquhar, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamner, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Logan Loomis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrik, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reilly, Richardson, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Shepherd, Snyder, Spencer, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Poucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vandever, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Whitlsey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—117.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allan, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Legare, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, May, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Naylor, Noyes, Ogile, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—94.

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

MEMORIAL.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, on leave, presented the memorial of the inhabitants of St. Albans, Vermont, upon the subject of the attack on the steamer Caroline, the neutrality law, and the disturbances on the Canadian frontier.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported with amendments Senate bill to appoint commissioners to adjust claims under the Choctaw treaty.

COMMODORE ELLIOTT.

Mr. NAYLOR, from the select committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of Commodore Elliott, while commanding in the Mediterranean, on leave, made a report thereon; which was read, and was accompanied by the following resolutions:

Resolved, That an interference, by the House of Representatives, in the disputes that occur between subordinate officers of the Navy and their superiors, commanding squadrons, is a power which ought at all times to be exercised with great caution, and is calculated to produce insubordination in that important arm of the national defense. But, in the opinion of this committee, it is competent for the Representatives of the people to investigate any abuses alleged to be committed by officers in command of squadrons, and to provide by law, for the recurrence of such abuses; and moreover to investigate and ascertain whether the head of the Navy Department may have used such means as are placed in his hands by law to punish and prevent any such alleged abuses.

Resolved, That the most appropriate remedy for such subordinate officers, is an appeal to the Secretary of the Navy for a court of inquiry to investigate the charges exhibited against their superiors; and from his decision the party aggrieved may appeal to the President, who, by the Constitution, is Commander-in-Chief of the Navy; he, as well as the Secretary, being liable to an impeachment for a willful and corrupt violation or neglect of duty.

Resolved, That the time allowed this committee is insufficient to enable them to make a full and thorough examination of the subject committed to them; that even a limited and partial examination would require them, contrary to the duty they owe to their immediate constituents and the country at large, to be absent daily during the sittings of the House at this important period of the session.

Resolved, therefore, That it is inexpedient to commence the investigation at this time, and that the chairman report these resolutions, with the journal of our proceedings, to the House, together with the opinion of this committee that the subject matter referred to them by the resolution of the House of the 14th instant requires investigation, and that he ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. NAYLOR moved to lay the subject on the table, and print, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, who moved its recommitment, with instructions to strike out the first resolution, and addressed the House at length on the subject.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to lay on the table and print all the reports; which was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. HOWARD, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any, and what, change has occurred, since his annual message, in the posture of the relations between the United States and Mexico, and to communicate to the House such correspondence relating thereto as may not be incompatible with the public interest.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

The question immediately pending was the motion of Mr. BRONSON, to amend that part of the bill providing for the support of the supreme court, by limiting the application of the contingent fund thereof.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at much length on the various leading topics of the day:

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. SLADE, who spoke for some time, when he gave way for a motion for the committee to rise, on which the vote was—yeas 44, noes 51; no quorum.

Mr. S. resumed and concluded, when the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 23, 1839.

Mr. LYON presented the petition of Israel V. Harris and others, praying the establishment of a post road from Kent, in Kent county, through the town of Tallmadge, to Muskegon, in Ottawa county, Michigan.

Also, two petitions signed by one hundred and sixty-five inhabitants of Kent county, Michigan, praying an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at Port Sheldon, in said State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BENTON presented three petitions from persons asking for preemption rights; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING presented a memorial of sundry citizens residing in Key Vacas, praying Congress that all legislation on the subject of making Indian Key a port of entry may be postponed until further investigation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG submitted a report of the Board of Public Works of the State of Illinois; which was laid on the table, and three hundred extra copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from Thomas Coyle, which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. LINN presented the papers of Peter Deselle, in relation to a land claim; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of William Rumsey, and the petition of the heirs of John L. De Van Brun, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. NORVELL, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Joseph R. Folsom, and the owners and crew of the brig Galaxy, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred a petition of Joseph Campan, for the confirmation of his title to a tract of land, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. L. also, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the bill to authorize the construction of certain improvements in Wisconsin, reported the same without amendment.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

An act for the relief of Dennis Tramell;
An act for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez;
An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas Glascock, deceased;

The bill to grant to the State of Indiana the right of preemption to a quantity of land, to aid in the construction of a railroad from New Albany, Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in Illinois; and
The bill to amend the act of 3d March, 1834, supplementary to the act entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

The bill to fix the minimum price of the public lands acquired by the Miami treaty of November 6, 1828;

The bill for the relief of John A. Jacobs;
A bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy;
A bill for the relief of Samuel Collins; and
The bill to amend the act of 3d March, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to amend the judicial system of the United States,'" and for other purposes, after being amended on motions of Messrs. LINN, CLAY of Alabama, NORVELL, and SEVIER, were severally ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act for the better organization of the United States Marine Corps was read the second time as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to provide for the appointment of a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, after some remarks from Messrs. BAYARD, WALL, SEVIER, HUBBARD, PRENTISS, BENTON, CALHOUN, and SMITH of Connecticut, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT said, that according to usage he did not intend to resume his seat in the Senate this session. He had a great deal of correspondence and some business at the public offices to attend to, which the Senate knew that he could not do while performing his duties in the chair, and therefore his absence from the Senate became indispensably necessary. He would take this occasion to express his obligations to the members of the Senate for the kindness and courtesy with which he had been treated during the years he had presided over their deliberations, and he concluded by wishing them all a safe and happy return to their families and their homes.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 23, 1839.

Sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

The bill to provide for the armed occupation of Florida, being taken up,

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. DOWNING earnestly solicited the gentleman to permit the bill be committed.

Mr. ROBERTSON declined.

Mr. DOWNING moved to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. YELL appealed to Mr. R. not to press his motion.

Mr. ROBERTSON again declined, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. YELL moved its postponement till Monday.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. CRAIG. That opens the whole merits of the question.

Mr. YELL withdrew his motion; and the question recurring on that to commit,

Mr. ROBERTSON opposed the bill with much earnestness, as, in effect, a proposition to add ten thousand men to the standing Army. If committed at all, he insisted it should be to a select committee; and if to any standing committee, it should be that on Public Lands. Moreover, there was no time for the due consideration of a measure of so much importance. If the system was a good one for Florida, why should it not be for the western portions of Missouri and Arkansas? It was, in effect, (he said,) a proposition to give away three million acres of the finest land in the world. Mr. R. concluded by renewing his motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. STANLY moved a call of the House; upon which motion,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 89, nays 60.

So the call was ordered, and proceeded in until one hundred and eighty-eight members answered to their names; when,

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, all further proceedings in the same were dispensed with.

The question then recurred on the motion to lay the bill on the table; upon which

Mr. GRENNELL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 91, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allan, John W. Allen, Ayer, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Giddings, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Hamer, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Sampson, Mason, Maury, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogilvie, Pearce, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanley, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Talliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Webster, Albert S. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Word, and Yorke—91.

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crabb, Craig, Cushman, Dawson, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Roward, Ingham, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kingensmith, Logan, Lyon, Maltory, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Noble, Noyes, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Farris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrik, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Richardson, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, Shepler, Spencer, Swearingen, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Weeks, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—94.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion to commit the same to the Committee on Military Affairs; but before taking the vote upon the same,

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to refer so much of the bill as provides for a survey of the lands to the Committee on Public Lands, and so much as relates to a supply of grain to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to consider the general appropriation bill, but waived it for the present, at the request of

Mr. THOMAS, on whose motion the House took up and considered Senate bill entitled "An act in amendment of the acts respecting the judicial system of the United States."

Mr. SERGEANT made a few remarks in relation to the nature of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS hoped the bill would be acted on now, as it had passed the Senate twice, had been favorably reported upon by the Judiciary Committee of the House, and had met the approval of the whole body of the judiciary.

Mr. SERGEANT made a few further remarks in defense of the bill; after which,

Mr. ADAMS inquired what punishment had been substituted for the whipping and pillory for felony, which, he perceived, had been abolished. He did not think a substitute had been provided therefore.

Mr. SERGEANT was understood to say that only a part of the punishment for felony had been abolished, and that the other portion, imprisonment, remained. The bill had undergone full investigation, and had met the approval of the Judiciary Committee and the judges of the Supreme Court, and hoped it would pass without delay.

Mr. ADAMS said there was strong authority to sustain the bill, and was unwilling to make any serious objection to it; but there were a number of alterations of the present code, and should like time to give it more mature consideration. There had been two ignominious punishments for felony abolished, (whipping and the pillory,) and no reasons had been assigned therefor; and for the withdrawal of these, there should at least something be substituted. The pillory was an ignominious punishment; but to throw the felon back upon the provisions of the former law which was left, was an aggravation of his punishment, and doing him great injustice. He was not willing to give up the punishment of the pillory, because it operated upon the mind; it acted upon the moral feeling of the man, and not upon his physical powers, as imprisonment did; it operated upon the reputation, and not upon the person; and he considered those punishments which operated upon the moral feeling the best, and would be in favor of increasing the penalties in this respect, and alleviating those upon the physical man. He would like to see the practice restored to the bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that this was a Senate bill, and could be acted upon at any time; and, by the rules of the House, we had but three days left in which we could send bills to the Senate, originating in this body; and he hoped the House would either act upon it without further debate, or postpone it until next Friday or Saturday.

The bill was then, without further debate, ordered to a third reading on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, transmitting all the facts in relation to the existing contract for carrying the mail from Louisville, Kentucky, to New Orleans; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Postmaster General, in pursuance of acts of Congress, transmitting the annual report of the contracts made for the transportation of the mail within the year preceding the 1st of July, 1838; also, a statement of all land and water mails established or ordered within the same year, other than those let to contracts at the annual lettings, together with a copy of the abstract of the offers made thereon, also, various other information under several acts of Congress; which were, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for the purpose of ascertaining what was to be printed.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) to consider the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. The immediate question before the House was the motion of Mr. BRONSON to limit the application of the contingent fund for the support of the Supreme Court.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded to discuss, at length, the policy of the past and present Administrations. He vindicated the Conservatives from the charge that they had abandoned the principles of General Jackson's administration, and said that they were governed by patriotic motives, &c., and gloried in his efforts to break down the Bank of the United States. He advocated the commitment of the public treasures of the nation to the banks, made some strictures upon Mr. Van Buren's letter to Sherrard Williams, and deprecated the idea of a specie currency, and contended that it was impracticable to carry on the commercial operations of the country; denounced the sub-Treasury bill as a scheme to increase Executive patronage and power, and would oppose such acquisition of power, whether it came from Henry Clay, William H. Harrison, or Martin Van Buren; that the refusal to receive State bank paper, went to destroy the power of the States, &c., and argued that the establishment of the sub-Treasury system would have the tendency to bring into existence another national bank. He denied that he and the Conservatives had formed an alliance, offensive or defensive, with any party, but that the Whigs had embraced their opinions, and let come what might, he would not change his opinions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor, and was about to proceed to address the House, when

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to Mr. UNDERWOOD the propriety of delaying his speech until the committee should take up the other appropriation bills. This bill was of great length, and would require considerable time to act upon the various amendments and engross the same; and the others were very short, and could with facility be passed through.

Mr. UNDERWOOD could not yield to the suggestion, but proceeded to reply at some length upon the speech of his colleague, [Mr. MURRAY,] and upon the question of currency, and the various other topics which occupy the public mind at the present day, concluding with the position that a national bank was the only remedy which could equalize the currency; and hence he was opposed to Mr. GARLAND's scheme, for the State banks would continue to blow up on every revolution or depression, as they had done heretofore.

Mr. HALSTED then went into a review of sundry small items of contingencies, and in touching, among other things, upon the Mint establishment, he averred that every dollar coined at New Orleans cost the country two dollars, at the other branches $1 50, while at Philadelphia the cost of coining was only eight mills on the dollar. Therefore he was for abolishing all but the one at the latter place. Mr. H. went over a variety of other topics.

Mr. REED made a few remarks which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. BRONSON remarked that, before the question was taken, he wished to correct an error which he had understood had occurred in the report of some remarks which he had made on introducing this amendment. He understood (for even now he has not observed the report) that he was represented to have charged the clerk of the Supreme Court with evil practice or abuse in this matter. He did not intend to say, and he thought he did not say, that the clerk had been guilty of any malpractice; and if he was so reported, he apprehended that he had been misunderstood. He believed that the charges which had been made by the clerk of the court were such as were authorized by law, or by the rules and practice of the court; and it was but justice to the clerk to say, that no misconduct or abuse was imputed to him personally. But Mr. B. said that he had probably stated (and such, as he understood it, was the true state of the case) that, as the law and the rules and practice of the court now stood, they seemed to allow of an abuse, or of something which operated as an abuse, towards the Government, by permitting the clerk to charge the Government for copies of records which had been printed at the expense of the Government; and he was still of the opinion that, inasmuch as the Government paid the expense of printing these records, they should not be charged by the clerk for copies of such as were necessary for the Attorney General in suits in which the United States were interested; and he conceived that, if such was the law, it was perfectly competent for Congress now to alter that law, so as to correct this thing, and relieve the Government from the charge complained of.

After a few remarks from Messrs. McKEN-NAN, SERGEANT, and CORWIN, in opposition to the amendment, and in explanation of the practice of the clerk,

Mr. BRONSON then withdrew his amendment; but

Mr. PETRIKIN renewed the same, and the question on its adoption was taken, and decided in the negative.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, indicated a number of amendments he should propose to the bill, retrenching clerkships in several of the Departments; and moved to substitute an appropriation for a charge d'affaires for the proposed appropriation for a minister plenipotentiary at the court of Spain.

The motion was opposed by Mr. CUSHING and Mr. HOWARD, and lost.

Mr. GARLAND also pointed out several subjects of complaint in the management of the Post Office Department, and warmly objected to an item of nearly $500,000 proposed in the bill to meet the demands of the Postmaster General.

An incidental discussion took place on an appropriation for arrearages in the expenditures for the Territory of Iowa, which led to extended explanations by Mr. CHAPMAN, the Delegate from that Territory, in relation to the difficulties between Governor Lucas and the Secretary of the Territory, Mr. Conway. The discussion resulted in the rejection of the item for arrears.

Mr. BOND proposed to limit the contingent fund for foreign missions to $600, and quoted a recommendation to that effect in the report of the Committee of Retrenchment of 1828; but, after a brisk encounter between him and Mr. CAMBRELENG and Mr. HOWARD, in relation to that report, the motion was negatived.

On motion of Mr. LYON, an item was inserted for a marine hospital at Mobile.

When the committee rose, an appeal was pending, which had been made by Mr. INGHAM from a decision of the Chairman, [Mr. BANKS,] in relation to his motion for a reappropriation of $100,000, formerly appropriated for a dry-dock in New York harbor.

On the motion to adjourn, the yeas and nays were called; when there were—34 for the adjournment, and 25 against it.

A motion for a call of the House was negatived.

After frequent attempts to get the bill out of committee, a little before twelve o'clock, p. m., the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 25, 1839.

At eleven o'clock, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, the Senate was called to order by the Secretary, and then proceeded to ballot for a President pro tempore.

On the first ballot thirty votes were given, of which Mr. KING, of Alabama, received twenty-eight, and was accordingly declared to be duly elected.

Mr. K. was then conducted to the chair by Messrs. BENTON and KNIGHT, and, in a neat and pertinent address, returned thanks for the honor conferred on him.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. RUGGLES presented a memorial from John Williams and eighty-seven others, remonstrating against the repeal of the duty on salt and abolition of the fishing bounties; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of Francis P. Harklerood, and the petition of Daniel Harklerood, severally praying preemption to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SWIFT presented two memorials of citizens of Addison county, Vermont, praying the establishment of a national foundry at Vergennes, in that State; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial of the Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, praying that the usual annual appropriation may be made for the improvement of the harbor of said city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NORVELL said that two or three weeks ago a memorial was presented from a naturalized citizen of the United States, resident in Michigan, praying that Congress would adopt measures to secure effectual protection to such citizens under all circumstances. He had the honor now to lay before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, instructing her Senators and requesting her Representative "to use their efforts for the adoption of such measures as will insure the recognition, by foreign Powers with whom we have national intercourse, of the absolute citizenship of all foreigners naturalized by the existing laws of the United States." He begged leave, moreover, at the same time, to present a memorial from a large body of the respectable naturalized citizens of Michigan, having the same interesting object in view. Having given his views somewhat at length, on a former occasion, in relation to the rights of this numerous and valuable class of American citizens, and the corresponding obligations of the United States to afford them complete protection at all times, under all lawful circumstances, and at all hazards, he should only add that the joint resolution and the memorial which he held in his hand met his entire concurrence.

The memorials, on Mr. N.'s motion, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the following, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to:

A memorial in relation to the condition of the Mineral Bank of Wisconsin;

A memorial of the New York Screw Dock Company, for the remission of duty on iron imported by them;

A memorial of Joseph Shaw, praying remission of duties on imported cordage; and

An act to authorize the cancellation of certain debenture bonds on the exportation of coal.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to provide for the better security of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

RECESS—HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted a resolution that the Senate should hereafter take a recess from three to five o'clock; and, after some remarks from Mr. H. on the amount of business on the Calendar, and the necessity of the adoption of the proposed resolution, it was decided in the negative—yeas 14, nays 17.

Mr. DAVIS then submitted a resolution that hereafter, the Senate meet daily at ten o'clock; which was agreed to—yeas 15, nays 14.

ELECTION OF ASSISTANT DOORKEEPER.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of notice given, moved that the Senate go into an election of an assistant doorkeeper; which, after some debate, was laid on the table—yeas 23, nays 17.

SAND-BAR IN CONNECTICUT RIVER.

Mr. NILES submitted the following motion; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate whether the sum of $25,000, appropriated in 1836 for removing the sand-bar at the mouth of the Connecticut river, has been expended for that object, or any part thereof; and if not, the reasons why the said appropriation has not been expended agreeably to the act appropriating the same.

EMIGRANT INDIANS.

The bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, was taken up on its third reading, and after some remarks from Mr. CALHOUN, in opposition to the bill, the question on its passage was decided in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Merriek, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Williams of Maine, and Williams of Mississippi—10.

So the bill was passed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The bill to provide for the appointment of a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was considered on the question of its passage, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merriek, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—12.

So the bill was passed.

MARINE CORPS.

The bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act for the better organization of the United States marine corps, was read the third time and passed.

SMITHSON BEQUEST.

The bill providing for the disposition and management of the fund bequeathed to the United States, in trust, by James Smithson, of London, deceased, for the establishment of an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, was taken up, and, after an animated discussion, in which Messrs. ROBBINS, NILES, CALHOUN, WALKER, CRITTENDEN, BROWN, BENTON, and HUBBARD participated, it was, on motion of Mr. H., laid on the table—yeas 20, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Walker, and Young—15.

BOUNDARY OF MAINE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, rose and asked the indulgence of the Senate to make some remarks upon an article in a leading journal of this city, (the National Intelligencer,) published this morning, in which the recent proceedings of the State of Maine and of the people of that State were represented in a light not only unjust, but injurious. The struggle in which Maine is now engaged to maintain and defend her rights and the rights of the nation, is one of the deepest interest and concern to both; and to find a leading and influential journal at the seat of Government coming out and condemning the course pursued by Maine in a controversy with a foreign nation was not only a reproach upon his State, but calculated to prejudice the public mind upon a question of the first importance to the State and nation.

The editorial article referred to is calculated to impress upon the nation that the people and the Legislature of Maine have been hurried into "very hasty measures;" that "the boundary question is not so much a question of real substantial interest as it is of State feeling, stimulated by the rivalry between the two great parties in the State which shall turn it most to its advantage;" that "the boundary question is a game which is expected to be won by the side which succeeds in driving the ball furthest;" that "the Governor of Maine gets the Legislature to authorize him to send out a body of men to drive the British subjects off from the land which Great Britain claims and actually occupies, and which is claimed also as territory of the United States;" and "the first that Congress hears of them is, that the Governor of Maine is actually levying war against a Power in amity with the United States."

Maine is now struggling, and perhaps bleeding, in defense of her rights, invaded and threatened by a foreign Power; and to see her Government and people thus unjustly and injuriously treated, is too much for any of her representatives to suffer to pass unnoticed and unrebuked. He had nothing to say of the motives which could have induced the publication; his business was to expose to the Senate and to the nation the great injustice done by this publication to his State and to the government of it, and with this view he desired to place before the Senate the facts which had led to the present alarming and interesting state of affairs. As to the right of the United States and Maine to the territory in dispute between this country and Great Britain, he would not say more than to refer to the unanimous declaration of both Houses of Congress at the last session. As to the question of jurisdiction, it might be important to spread before the Senate the facts in the case, which he would do as briefly as possible. Prior to 1820, Maine was part of Massachusetts, and the seat of government was at Boston, four or five hundred miles from the territory now in dispute. But little was then known of the Madawaska or the Aroostook; they lay far beyond the settled part of the Commonwealth, and with the exception of the Madawaska settlement, were wilderness and uninhabited. Whatever communication there was, and could be, between the settled part of Massachusetts and Madawaska, was through the British Provinces and up the St. Johns river.

The commissioners under the treaty of Ghent had been expected to settle and determine the treaty line, until about the time Maine was separated from Massachusetts; and until their disagreement was made public, no one had any apprehension that Great Britain would pretend that the highlands of the treaty were to be found at Mar's Hill. In 1820 Maine became a separate State, owning one half of the unsold lands, and Massachusetts the other half; and in 1821 or 1822, an agent of the State of Maine was sent into the Madawaska and Aroostook countries to ascertain their condition, to look after the timber, and to prosecute trespassers. This was effected, and satisfaction obtained for the timber which had been cut. The same course was pursued the following year, and nearly, if not quite, every year from that time to this. In 1825, the land agents of Massachusetts and Maine were empowered to convey lands in the Madawaska settlements, and in 1826 some lots were conveyed to settlers there. In 1827, Baker and others were arrested by the provincial authorities, and imprisoned at Frederickton for alleged misdemeanors at Madawaska in raising the American flag and stopping his Majesty's mail. After a long confinement he was tried, convicted, and sentenced by a foreign court to pay a fine and suffer imprisonment. These proceedings were protested against by this Government, and Baker's release was the consequence; but no satisfaction for the wrong has ever been obtained. In 1831, Hunnewell, Wheelock, and Savage were arrested and imprisoned, under provincial authority, for attempting to organize the town of Madawaska, under a law of the State of Maine. Upon remonstrance being made, they were finally pardoned and set at liberty, but no recompense was ever made for the wrong done them. In 1837, Greeley, who was employed under a law of the State of Maine to enumerate the persons at Madawaska, was twice arrested and committed to prison by the provincial authorities, and finally released upon the demand of this Government; but without any satisfaction being made for the wrong done him.

In consequence of these difficulties, and to avoid the evils of a conflict of jurisdiction, an informal, and somewhat indefinite, understanding was had between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, that pending the negotiation and arbitration as to the line of boundary between the two countries, neither party should extend its jurisdiction in the disputed territory, or do acts to strengthen its claim to the prejudice of the other party. While it is admitted that the British Government might well claim jurisdiction over the early settled part of Madawaska, it can scarcely be pretended that such claim would include the American settlers further up the St. Johns, who settled there about the year 1816; but however that may be, there can be no just pretense that the British Government ever had jurisdiction in the Aroostook country. And as relates to recent events in Maine, it is important to keep in mind that the facts, so far as relate to the question of jurisdiction, are very different in the Aroostook country from what they are in the Madawaska country. In the latter, there were early settlements and grants from the Crown. In the former, the first settlements were not earlier than 1822, made by American citizens and persons from the Provinces, who resorted there to be within American territory, and beyond the reach of their Provincial creditors. Very soon after the establishment of the monument at the source of the St. Croix, a line was run due north therefrom, and two ranges of townships, each of six miles square, were surveyed and located by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, contiguous to that line, and extending northwardly many miles beyond the Aroostook river. The township including the Aroostook river and adjoining to the due north line, was conveyed by Massachusetts as early as 1807; and other townships and parts of townships were conveyed soon after, all of which have been, and are, held by those grantees and their assigns.

In 1826, the territory west of these two ranges of townships, and extending near to St. Johns river, was surveyed under the joint authority of Massachusetts and Maine, into townships of six miles square, and soon after divided between those States. Many of these townships have been sold to individuals, and the others remain the property of the State. A road has been marked out from the military road, near Mattawamkeag, across the Aroostook, and thence on to the St. Johns, and is well made to the Aroostook river.

The land agents of Maine and Massachusetts have frequently, and almost yearly, been upon that territory, sold timber, granted permits, prosecuted trespassers, and exercised other acts of ownership. The persons settled upon that river look to Massachusetts and Maine for titles to the land they possess; and it is not known that the British authorities ever made, or proposed to make, grants to any of them. In fact, the only claim to jurisdiction by the British authorities, so far as known, depends upon their assumption that, as the land once belonged to the Crown, and has not been set apart, the title of jurisdiction remains now in the Crown; that by the arrangement before mentioned, they retain jurisdiction until the controversy about the boundary shall be settled; and that they have a warden to look after trespassers upon the disputed territory, for the benefit of the party to whom the land may finally be awarded. The claim to exclusive jurisdiction is of very recent origin, and without a shadow of foundation. Whenever advanced, it has been denied by our Government; and in 1829 we find the Acting Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in a letter to the British Minister, uses this language:

"I am induced to submit to your Excellency's consideration the propriety of an officer being appointed by the General Government of the United States, to act in concert with Mr. McLaughlin, in guarding against further depredations, and the infraction of the existing understanding between the two Governments, until the pending question between the two Governments shall be decided."

And now, the claim is to the exclusive jurisdiction.

Let us now look at the causes which have brought on the alarming state of things which threatens the peace of the country, and see whether or not the government and people of Maine are justly chargeable with "very hasty measures."

During the last year, the land agent of Maine went twice upon the territory on and about the Aroostook waters, saw the persons who had prepared to cut timber, warned them to desist, and, in some cases, sued the persons concerned, and obtained satisfaction for what they had cut, and, in all instances, the trespassers promised to quit. Fearing that, after he should be gone, the trespassers might return to their work of destruction, he notified them that, if they should do so, he should prosecute them and take their teams. In December, the land agents sent Mr. Buckmore to the Aroostook and Fish rivers, to prevent, as far as he could, any trespassing upon the public lands.

In January, that agent reported to the Governor of Maine that vast depredations were committed by some two or three hundred persons, who not only refused to desist, but defied the power of the State to prevent their cutting timber to any extent they pleased. The Governor communicated that information to the Legislature then in session. The Legislature thereupon "directed the land agent forthwith to employ sufficient force to arrest, detain, and imprison all persons trespassing upon the territory of the State, and to dispose of the teams, lumber, and other materials of the trespassers, as he should deem necessary and expedient." Under this resolve, the land agent proceeded with about two hundred chosen men to the scene of operations on the Aroostook, dispersed most of the trespassers, and arrested some fifteen or twenty. On the following night, while the land agent was in bed, he was surrounded by armed men, and ordered to Frederickton. On his inquiring their authority, they presented bayonets, and compelled him to go with them to Woodstock, where there was some examination by magistrates, and then ordered to Frederickton under military guard, in a most humiliating manner. What is his present condition is not known.

Upon this, Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, issued his proclamation, reciting that he had received information that a party of armed persons, two hundred or more, had invaded that province from the neighboring State of Maine, for the professed object of exercising authority, and driving off persons stated to be cutting timber therein, and ordering a sufficient military force to proceed forthwith to the place where these outrages are said to have been committed, as well to repel foreign invasion as to prevent illegal acts of her Majesty's subjects, a draft of militia from two brigades. Upon receipt of that proclamation, the Governor of Maine ordered a reinforcement of five hundred armed men to sustain the land agent's party in the discharge of their duty, communicated the proclamation to the Legislature, with a statement of what had occurred; and also transmitting a letter received by him from Lieutenant Governor Harvey, in which the latter asserted the right of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and informing that he had instructions not to suffer any interference with the possession or jurisdiction of that territory, asking that the land agent's party may be withdrawn, and adding that "he had directed a strong force of her Majesty's troops to be in readiness to support her Majesty's authority, and protect her Majesty's subjects in the disputed territory, in the event of that request not being immediately complied with." The Legislature approved the Governor's course, and made a large appropriation to enable him to carry it out. The Governor returned an answer to Sir John Harvey, that he should not comply with his request, and that the land agent's party would not be withdrawn, so long as he could find sufficient force to maintain them there, and one thousand men have already marched, and no doubt are at this moment upon the disputed territory, to sustain the land agent, and to execute the laws of their State, and, if attacked, may now be pouring out their blood in defense of their country, and in maintaining the rights and honor of their State. The Governor has communicated all to the President, and we may expect a message to-morrow, informing us of the course he may think proper to pursue on this momentous question.

Having stated the facts, as Mr. W. believed them to exist, he submitted to the Senate and to the nation whether the government or people of Maine were justly chargeable with adopting "very hasty measures," or "levying war against a Power in amity with the United States?" As to the idea of the boundary question being in Maine a party question, or a game to be won "by the side which succeeds in driving the ball furthest," it was no such thing. Although there are political parties in Maine, they are extinguished upon this great, vital, and all-absorbing question of boundary, and the maintenance of the rights and honor of the State. On this question there is but one voice and one determination, as well in the government as in the people of Maine; and that is, to maintain inviolate her whole territory; and, before yielding to the haughty demand of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to withdraw her land agent and the force necessary to sustain him in the execution of his duties, the best blood of her citizens will be freely shed to repel invasion, and to vindicate the rights of Maine and the honor of the nation.

Mr. WALKER said that he was not at all surprised at the course of the paper alluded to on this subject. It had but followed its instincts in this matter. In the difficulties with the Indians it had advocated their pretensions in opposition to the Government; in our difficulties with France it was the French organ; in our dispute with Mexico it was the Mexican organ; and in the present difficulty it was very natural it should be the British organ. Whenever we have had difficulties with a foreign Power, this paper was sure to be found advocating foreign interests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore interposed, and said there being no question before the Senate, the remarks of the Senator were out of order.

Mr. DAVIS, by unanimous consent, offered some remarks on the subject of the difficulty on the borders of Maine; and said that, as to the question of the right of this country to the disputed territory, there was not a shadow of doubt, but advised calmness and deliberation in the consideration of the matter. If, on a full and calm consideration of the matter, an appeal to arms for the protection and defense of our rights was thought necessary, he would not be found faltering.

CITIZENS IN OREGON.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the bill to provide for the protection of the citizens of the United States residing in the Oregon Territory, or trading on the Columbia river, was taken up; and, after some remarks from Mr. L.,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Navy appropriation bill was then taken up; and

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, said he had an amendment to offer; but the chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. RIVES] not being in his seat, he hoped the bill would be permitted to lay over till to-morrow.

Mr. WRIGHT gave notice that he would call it up to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

DAVID WALLER.

The bill granting a pension to David Waller was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CIRCUIT COURT IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill to explain and limit the powers of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, was taken up and ordered to be engrossed—yeas 24, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Foster, Knight, Prentiss, Preston, Swift, Tallmadge, and White—10.

LAND CLAIMS IN MICHIGAN.

The bill to amend an act confirming certain land claims in Michigan was, after some remarks from Mr. LYON, read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HEIRS OF PHILIP BARBER.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Philip Barber, deceased, was, on motion of Mr. WALKER, after some remarks, indefinitely postponed.

The bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made by the commissioners under the several treaties with foreign Powers, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BOUNTY LANDS TO SOLDIERS.

The bill to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers of the late war to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof, was, after a brief explanation from Mr. FULTON, also ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

J. AND W. BEESON.

The bill for the relief of J. and W. Beeson and others was also considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 25, 1839.

The regular business of the day being the call for resolutions,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of calling the committees for reports, and proceeding with the public business.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to present the following resolution; which was read for information:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring therein,) That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the several States of the Union, which, when ratified by three fourths of the Legislatures of said States, shall become and be a part of the Constitution of the United States:

First. From and after the 4th day of July, 1842, there shall be, throughout the United States, no hereditary slavery; but, on and after that day, every child born within the United States, their Territories or jurisdiction, shall be born free.

Second. With the exception of the Territory of Florida, there shall henceforth never be admitted into this Union any State, the constitution of which shall tolerate within the same the existence of slavery.

Third. From and after the 4th of July, 1845, there shall be neither slavery nor slave trade at the seat of Government of the United States.

Objection having been made,

Mr. A. proceeded to state that he had in his possession a petition which he desired to present, and on which these resolutions were founded. It was a petition from John Jay and forty-three most respectable citizens of the city of New York. [Mr. A. was here interrupted by cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER having decided that the motion to suspend the rule must first be disposed of, Mr. ADAMS did not press the motion further at this time.

The question having been taken on the motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the rules were suspended.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee of Claims, made a report against the petition of James Young.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the same committee, made a report upon the petition of Joseph H. Walters; and the same was referred to the Secretary of War.

Also, reported bills for the relief of Daniel Steenrod and William P. Rathbone.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the same committee, made a report against the petition of William Thomas.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for repairing certain public works.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the committee of Claims, made a report against the petitions of John M. Pounds and William H. Spiller.

Also, reported Senate bill, with amendments, for the relief of Gad Humphreys, of the Territory of Florida.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Elisha Eldridge.

Also, a bill explanatory of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, buoys," and making surveys for the year 1838, passed 7th July, 1833.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, without amendment, Senate bills authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof; and authorize certain certificates of deposit to be canceled and reissued; which last mentioned bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, with amendments, Senate bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands who were deprived of the benefits of the act granting preemption rights, which was approved on the 19th of May, 1834.

Some debate followed, (directed to the question of engrossment or commitment,) in which Messrs LINCOLN, CHAPMAN, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and CRABB participated.

When, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the bill (ayes 82, noes 54) was laid on the table.

Mr. LOOMIS, from the same committee, reported, with amendment, Senate bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain preemption claims to land in Indiana.

Also, made a report on the subject of securing to actual settlers on public lands the right of preemption to their own improvements, when offered for sale, in preference to others, accompanied by a bill for that purpose.

Also, reported a bill authorizing the issuing of land scrip to satisfy military bounty land warrants.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, Senate bill supplemental to the act granting certain city lots to the corporation of the Columbia College, for the purposes therein mentioned, approved 14th July, 1832.

This bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. TOUCEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to prevent the abatement of suits and actions now pending, in which the Bank of Columbia, in Georgetown, may be a party; which bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. T. also, from the same committee, reported an amendatory bill to authorize the circuit courts of the United States to appoint their own clerks, and to regulate the fees of clerks in the States of Louisiana and Alabama.

Also, Senate bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, without amendment; which bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported a bill to change the terms of the circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana, and the southern district of Alabama; which was, on his motion, laid on the table.

Mr. MAY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to confirm the title to a certain tract of land in the county of Mobile.

Also, for the relief of Daniel Maisaque.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported, with amendments, Senate bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved 9th July, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved 2d March, 1833.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the erection of certain military works on the northeastern frontier of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported, at length, relative to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Adams, of Massachusetts.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Joseph Bassett; and made a report against the petition of Jacob White.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Elisha Benton; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. J. also made an unfavorable report on the petition of Jacob White; which was laid on the table.

Mr. CHILDS, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Elnathan Sears.

Mr. FRY, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Christian Brougher, of Pennsylvania, and made a report against the petition of Margaret Wade.

Also, reported Senate bill to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, in Vermont, with amendments.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, made a report upon the subject of an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Ohio river, and reported an amendment to the joint resolution now before the House, authorizing certain military surveys.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, made a report upon the subject of having the public buildings, hereafter to be erected, built either of marble or granite, instead of sandstone.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, laid before the House certain communications in relation to the material for the construction of public buildings; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JENIFER, chairman of the select committee to which had been referred so much of the President's message as relates to the tobacco trade with foreign nations, made a report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD said that as this was a very important report, he would move the printing of five thousand extra copies.

And the rule having been suspended, the motion to print (having been urged briefly by Messrs. HOWARD, and JOHNSON of Maryland) was agreed to.

Mr. MAY presented certain joint resolutions from the Legislature of Illinois, on the subject of the currency; which were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill abolishing imprisonment for debt in certain cases had been passed. The motion was entered.

On motion of Mr. TOUCEY, the rules were suspended for the purpose of considering the motion to reconsider the vote abolishing imprisonment for debt.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the previous question.

The bill having, on motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, been read,

The previous question was seconded, and the main question (being on the reconsideration) was ordered and taken;

And the motion to reconsider was rejected.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the act amending the act in relation to the judicial system of the United States was taken up on the question of final passage.

Mr. EVERETT moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of striking out the second section.

Some debate followed, in which Messrs. EVERETT and THOMAS participated.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was rejected.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered;

And the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CASEY, leave was granted to O. Wallace to withdraw certain papers from the files of the House.

Mr. WORD, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions from the Legislature of Mississippi, in relation to post roads in the United States.

Also, presented the petition of David G. Harvey.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BANKS in the chair) on the above bill.

The appeal in relation to the amendment for a reappropriation for a dry-dock at Brooklyn was withdrawn; and so the question pending on Saturday fell to the ground.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the following item was stricken out, (provision having been made therefor in another bill):

"For carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and Texas of the 25th April, 1838."

Mr. SLADE moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $2,000, to enable the President to defray the expenses of sending a commercial agent to Hayti, for the purpose of establishing commercial relations therewith.

The CHAIRMAN decided this amendment to be out of order, on the ground that it was for an object not authorized by law.

Mr. SLADE appealed from the decision; and a debate followed, in which Messrs. SLADE, CAMBRELENG, CRAIG, FLETCHER of Massachusetts, LEGARE, TILLINGHAST, WISE, HOWARD, TOUCEY, ADAMS, WHITTLESEY, and CUSHING took part, and which resulted in affirming the decision of the Chair.

A variety of amendments were moved by Mr. CAMBRELENG, and agreed to. After which, another question of order occupied the House on an item moved by Mr. C., the operation of which would be to restore to certain officers of the customs the salaries they received in 1832; the repeal of the duties on certain articles, and the operations of the tariff having deprived them of the sources from which they received the same; the duties of the office being as laborious as they were when the act regulating their pay became a law.

The CHAIRMAN decided that the amendment was in order, because it proposed to fulfill the provisions of a former act.

Mr. EVERETT resisted this as an increase of expenditure not authorized by law; and the question was debated by Messrs. EVERETT, CAMBRELENG, BRIGGS, PETRIKIN, CUSHING, HOWARD, CUSHMAN, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, REED, PARMENTER, LEGARE, RANDOLPH, and MERCER; when the decision of the Chair was reversed by the House, and the amendments rejected.

Mr. PRATT, in the course of the above debate, under the impression that the appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for a dry-dock at Brooklyn was still pending, intimated his wish to address the House upon that subject; but as he was mistaken as to the question now before the committee, and holding to the opinion that time is money, if the House had no objection, he would write his views out upon that subject, instead of contributing to its waste at this late period of the session. The House granted him leave.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved an amendment to distribute certain copies of the Documentary History of the United States, now in the State Department, among the members of the House who had not received them; which was agreed to.

On another item of appropriation which proposed both an outfit and salary to a charge to Holland, Mr. STANLY inquired of Mr. HOWARD, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whether it was intended to recall the present minister, (Mr. Devizac,) and appoint another?

Mr. HOWARD replied, it was his opinion that there would be a change in that mission.

Mr. STANLY inquired whether he was at liberty to state whether certain rumors stating the present Minister to be a public defaulter were well founded?

Mr. HOWARD replied that he did not know, or feel himself authorized to state.

Mr. SLADE moved to strike out the item of an outfit for a charge to Holland; and on that motion went into a speech, at large, in favor of appointing a diplomatic agent to Hayti.

Mr. S. spoke for several hours, and was finally called to order, and the House refused to permit him to continue his remarks, after considerable conference, and various motions for the committee to rise.

Mr. SERGEANT moved an item of $15,000 to pay the clerks in the custom-house at Philadelphia certain arrears of salary, or so much of that sum as might be necessary; and, in support of the claim, said it had been acknowledged by the collector and Secretary of the Treasury as just.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had no doubt the justice of the claim, but upon the same principle as the amendment offered by him, proposing to supply a deficiency in the salaries of other custom-house clerks, it was out of order. The Chair decided his amendment was in order, but the committee thought proper to reverse that decision. To be consistent, the committee ought to declare this out of order.

The CHAIRMAN, however, again decided (notwithstanding the reversal of his former decision) that this amendment was in order.

The decision was sustained by the committee, and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG presented certain additional items of amendment; which were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, presented an amendment in the shape of a new section, the object of which was to confine all civil officers and agents to their salaries, so that they shall not receive, by fees or otherwise, more than $4,000; the surplus to be paid over to the Treasury. The amendment excepts certain officers therein named.

Mr. CAMBRELENG objected that the amendment was not in order, on the ground that it was not in order to modify or repeal a law creating salaries, &c., in a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN decided the amendment to be in order.

After some debate between Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, CAMBRELENG, and REED,

Mr. BRONSON moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto, "or any other officer whose salary is fixed by law."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, accepted the modification; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY offered an amendment that no officers or persons whose salaries are fixed by law and regulation shall receive any allowance for disbursement of public moneys, &c., unless authorized by law.

An amendment to the amendment was offered limiting to thirty dollars per annum the sum to be expended by the heads of Executive Departments for newspapers or periodicals not necessary for the use of their offices; which was agreed to.

And the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BOND moved a new section, that the printing of the Executive Departments shall be done by contract; proposals to be advertised for, and contracts to be let to the lowest bidder.

After a few remarks from Mr. B., the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by striking out "for compensation to the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, per act of 23d June, 1836, $3,600."

After a few remarks from Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana, and CAMBRELENG, (the latter gentleman having stated that such clerks were still required,)

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, modified his motion so as to insert, after "1836," the words "entitled an act to regulate the deposits of the public money."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOTY moved an amendment appropriating $10,000 for surveys of the public lands north of the Wisconsin.

Mr. DOTY and Mr. CAMBRELENG supported the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the bill by inserting "five" instead of "eight" dollars per mile for surveying the public lands in Louisiana.

After a few remarks from Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana and PETRIKIN,

The amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the appropriation of $32,000 for contingent expenses, pay, mileage, &c., of the members of the Legislature of Wisconsin, was reduced to $25,000.

Mr. DROMGOOLE offered a new section, increasing the salaries of such clerks in the Departments of War, Treasury, and Navy, and clerks of both Houses of Congress and the Library, &c., whose salaries were under $2,000. [Increasing the salaries of all officers drawing under $1,000 twenty per cent., and over that sum, but under $2,000, ten per cent.]

The motion was supported by Messrs. DROMGOOLE and BOULDIN, and opposed by Mr. GRAVES, who called upon all those gentlemen who were opposed to this Administration on the ground of its extravagance, to resist this amendment.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the amendment by including the clerks in the General Post Office.

Mr. DROMGOOLE accepted this as a modification.

The debate was continued by Mr. PRATT, who said he was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE.] He thought, by a prudent application of the salaries they now receive, it was a competency to support them in a genteel style. He inferred from the quarter in which the amendment originated, and the ready support which it received by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] there should strong suspicions attach to it. He was not astonished that these gentlemen should step forward to take care of those who belonged to their State by birth—they were governed by a kind of State pride in the matter. He had examined into the condition of the Departments of Government in this respect, to ascertain whether the State he in part represented had her quota in the public service of the country; and he was somewhat astonished to find that the sons of Virginia received from the Government more than $500,000, and Pennsylvania $200,000, in the way of salaries, whilst the great State of New York received not more than $50,000. He had prepared statements to show this result, but would not detain the House to read them. He was opposed to any increase; and he was astonished to find some gentlemen who talked so much about extravagant expenditures, so ready to come forward to heap large salaries upon non-producing officials; but when any proposition to do justice to the workingmen in the employment of the Government was before us, they spurned it from them. These are the men who deserve and need the assistance and protection of Congress. Their faces are ground into the dust, whilst those less worthy are pampered in indolence. These perfumed Whig officeholders, who push themselves forward as the leaders of the ton, should never receive his vote to increase the means to promote luxurious extravagance, and to increase their indolence.

Gentlemen in the Opposition need not apprehend that an increase of salary would be giving these officials the means to assist in perpetuating this Administration. No, there need be no fears upon that score; but, on the other hand, it would be voting means to overthrow the present Administration; for it can be proved beyond controversy that more than two thirds of them were opposed to it. He did not wish to be understood as casting any imputation upon them; but, on the other hand, he had an exalted opinion of many. He would ask gentlemen to look to the workingmen in the employment of the Government, who work from sun to sun, in this District, and emphatically, and in truth, earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, and receive probably the pittance of $1 50 per day. It is those who should receive an increase of their pay, those who are contributing to build up your Navy, and adding to the glory of the country, they are equally, if not more meritorious, and their employment is equally intellectual as those who are the mere scribes or examiners of other men's inventions. He sincerely wished that he could contribute to pay this class of men more in accordance with their merits, industry, and efficiency. He hoped the amendment would be rejected; but if there is to be an increase, let it be done in the proper manner, at the next session, including the workingmen, as well as the clerks.

The debate was further continued by Mr. McKENNAN, in favor of the amendment.

The amendment was also supported further by Messrs. BOULDIN and SLADE, and opposed by Messrs. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, GRAVES, and EWING.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the amendment by striking out $2,000 and inserting $1,800.

Mr. P. spoke in favor of the whole proposition.

Mr. DROMGOOLE accepted this also as a modification, and further modified his amendment by including the clerks in the Attorney General's office.

After some further remarks by Mr. GRAVES, Mr. SLADE moved to amend the amendment by making the maximum $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken, the amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. BOND moved to strike out the appropriation of $100,000 for the construction of the new Treasury building.

Some remarks followed from Messrs. BOND, CAMBRELENG, and LINCOLN.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LINCOLN moved to increase the above appropriation to $135,000.

After some remarks from Messrs. EVERETT and LINCOLN,

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON moved to amend the bill by adding to other similar appropriations an amount for surveys of public lands in Missouri.

Mr. YELL moved to amend the amendment by extending the benefit of the appropriation to Arkansas.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. SLADE offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the President be, and hereby is, requested duly to accredit to the Government of the Republic of Hayti the commercial agents of the United States now residing, or who may hereafter be appointed to reside, near that Government.

The CHAIRMAN decided the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. SLADE appealed, and spoke briefly to the question.

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. OGLE moved to strike out the appropriation for the branch mints in North Carolina, Louisiana, and Georgia, and to appropriate $600 each to persons to take charge of the public property there.

Mr. O. addressed the committee at great length, and in review of the numerous experiments made on the currency, the last of which was the sub-Treasury, which had been so often and so emphatically condemned.

Mr. HOLSEY replied, in vindication of the branch mint of Georgia.

Mr. CAMBRELENG followed in a few remarks, and expressed his conviction that, to be successful, the gentleman must at least modify his motion. He appealed to the gentleman not to press his motion at this late hour, and to allow the bill to be reported.

Mr. HALSTED (at half past twelve o'clock) moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected.

Some further debate followed, in which Messrs. OGLE and MALLORY participated.

Mr. MONTGOMERY indicated his desire to address the committee; and, as the hour was so late, moved that the committee rise.

And the committee having divided; there appeared—ayes 25.

Mr. M. withdrew the motion before the noes were counted.

Mr. CHAMBERS renewed the motion; and there appeared—ayes 25, noes 52; no quorum.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the committee rise and report the fact; when there appeared—ayes 25, noes 45; no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN, in reply to Mr. R., decided that it required the vote of a majority of those present in committee to rise and report the fact of the want of a quorum.

Mr. MERCER appealed.

A scene of much confusion and disorder ensued, and some conversation of a personal character between Mr. CHAMBERS and the CHAIRMAN.

The appeal was debated by Mr. MERCER.

Mr. HOWARD reminded the members that a subject of the most vital interest would be up tomorrow, affecting the character and honor of the country, which must be acted upon; and he implored the committee to take this bill out of committee to-night.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, was as anxious to get the bill out of committee as any gentleman; but he was not willing that the bill should be reported when not even a quorum was present.

Mr. TILLINGHAST debated the appeal.

After which, Mr. TOUCEY moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to.

And the committee having risen, the Chairman reported the fact of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. TOUCEY moved that the House adjourn; on which motion the yeas and nays were asked and refused.

And then (at one o'clock, a. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. MILLER presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Missouri. Also, petitions signed by Abraham Vanmeter, William Hook, and others, asking the establishment of a mail route from Jonesboro, in Saline county, Missouri, by the way of Hook's Mills, Victoria, to Carrollton, in Carroll county, in said State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The petition of P. Walsh and others, citizens of Missouri, asking the passage of a law by Congress, ratifying and confirming an act passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Wisconsin on the 16th January, 1838, for the partition of the Half-Breed Indian lands in the now Territory of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A joint memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, asking the passage of a law by Congress granting to all persons who may hereafter settle on the public lands, and who shall continue to occupy the same for two years after settlement on such lands, the right of preemption thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. A joint memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, asking the passage of a law by Congress requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the register of the particular land district where land may be hereafter purchased, to indorse on each patent or plat of the section in which said land lies, the length of the boundary lines thereof, and a plain description of the section, fractional section, quarter section, and legal subdivisional corners of the same, and that the same be done free of expense to the purchasers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RIDGWAY presented a petition signed by forty-two females and twenty-nine males, of Marion county, Ohio, who memorialize the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, to take into consideration the condition of the descendants of Africa who are now groaning under the galling yoke of slavery. They ask Congress to use their utmost influence, in a peaceful manner, as a council desiring the welfare of all its subjects, for the deliverance of the African race, that they may enjoy, under our Government, the rights and privileges of free men. The memorialists state that they have viewed, and deeply lamented, the system of slavery as practiced in this nation, believing it to be entirely at variance with the Christian religion; which was laid on the table. Also, a petition signed by sixty-five females and fifty-six males, from the same section of Ohio. They state that they have viewed, deplored, and deeply lamented, the condition of the aborigines of our country, which they believe calls loudly upon every Christian and philanthropist to intercede in their behalf; believing, as they do, that they are, and have been, a most injured people, driven from their homes, possessions, and the graves of their fathers, to seek an unknown and unmolested refuge, and that they were the original owners of the soil we now possess. Therefore, they desire of Congress, in their legislative capacity, to extend the hand of mercy to this people, by permitting them to enjoy, peaceably, the small remnants of their possessions which they now occupy, and like a kind father to extend the arm of protection over the residue of this people, that the blessing of Heaven may rest upon us; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 27, 1839.

In the Globe of Tuesday night, February 6, 1839, it is mentioned that the proposition of Mr. OGLE, of Pennsylvania, to strike out the appropriation to carry on the operation of the branch mints, &c., was debated by Messrs. OGLE, ROBERTSON of Virginia, STANLY, and W. THOMPSON, in favor of the amendment. This is a mistake, as far as I am concerned. I replied to my colleague, Mr. MONTGOMERY, and commented upon the mismanagement of, and large expenditures at, the branch mint in Charlotte.

I replied to Mr. MONTGOMERY because I thought, from his remarks, he intended to censure the Governor of North Carolina.

For the reasons assigned by Messrs. GRAHAM and DAWSON, I should oppose the amendment.

Will you correct this mistake?

Respectfully, &c.,

EDW. STANLY.

Messrs. BLAIR & RIVES.

The reporter's understanding of the tenor and general bearing of the remarks of Mr. STANLY, in reply to his colleague, (Mr. MONTGOMERY, who opposed the amendment of Mr. OGLE to suspend the operations of the branch mint at Charlotte,) and his censure of the manner in which that mint had been conducted, justified him in classing Mr. S., in the brief summary published in the Globe, among those who were in favor of breaking up that establishment.—REPORTER.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 26, 1839.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the allowances made to marshals; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. LYON presented a memorial from John P. Richardson and nineteen others, asking Congress to establish military posts on the Columbia river, and to hold out inducements to emigrants to the Oregon territory.

Mr. L. said if Congress would pass a law granting to each emigrant one thousand acres of land, a sufficient number of enterprising young men would go there to defend the country against attacks from any quarter. These young men would be of the number; and as he was acquainted with them, and knew them to be young men of character and respectability, he had no doubt they would perform whatever they promised.

The memorial was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, presented a petition from between six and seven hundred persons residing on or near the Penobscot river, praying for the erection of military defenses on the northeastern frontier; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LYON presented eight petitions from the following named persons: Marie Germaine, Joseph Campan, Ann Smith, Francis Cicott, Cornelius O'Flynn, assignees of the heirs of Henry Campan, Victor Morass, the assignees of Jean B. Cicott, and John M. Wilson, John Hulbert, and James L. Schoolcraft, all praying Congress to grant them other lands in lieu of those claimed by them; which had been sold or disposed of by the United States; which were referred to accompany Senate bill No. 71, being a general bill to provide for such cases.

Mr. BAYARD presented resolutions to rescind the expunging resolution; which were laid on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred an act to fix the compensation of the keeper of the public archives in the Territory of Florida, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

An act for the relief of Zebulon Paxson; and

An act for the relief of William Clark.

Mr. W., from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred an act granting to the supreme court of the Territory of Iowa the same compensation as that of Wisconsin, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W., from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of parties interested in the unsettled estates of persons proceeded against as bankrupts; which was read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and, after some remarks from Messrs. WALL and TALLMADGE, was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred various memorials and papers on the subject, reported a bill authorizing the erection of certain light-houses and light-boats, and the establishment of certain buoys and beacon-lights; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Joshua and William E. Kennedy, made an unfavorable report thereon.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Campan; which was read and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred an act for the relief of Don Carlos Dehaute Delassus, reported the same with amendments.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred a paper purporting to come from Thomas Coyle, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution to fix the value of the pound sterling of the British provinces at our custom-houses; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The resolution offered some time since by Mr. RIVES, in relation to the interference of Federal officers in elections was taken up; and

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, laid on the table.

BOUNTY LAND TO SETTLERS.

The bill to set apart a belt of land on the western borders of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, as bounty lands, to be granted to settlers engaged for a term of years in the defense of the frontier, was taken up; and after some remarks from Mr. FULTON on its great importance to the people of Arkansas in the present situation of our affairs, but that from the lateness of the period it was impossible for it to be acted on at the present session, he moved that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

LAND FOR MILITARY USES.

The bill to authorize the inhabitants of township eight north, range thirty-two west, in the State of Arkansas, to enter a section of land, in lieu of the sixteenth section of said township, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes.

BILLS ENGROSSED.

The following bills were severally considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

A bill to authorize the location of the preëmption certificates given by the register of the land office at Batesville, in Arkansas, under the act of the 26th of May, 1824, on any of the public lands for sale in the State of Arkansas;

A bill for the relief of Daniel B. Bush;

A bill for the relief of John S. Billings;

A bill for the relief of the administrator on the estate of Joseph Edson;

A bill to provide for additional clerks in the Post Office Department and the Auditor's Office connected therewith, and for other purposes;

A bill for the relief of John Richey;

A bill for the relief of John L. Scott;

A bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodd;

A bill for the relief of Richard Robertson;

A bill for the relief of John Burke;

A bill for the relief of Hannah Leighton;

A bill granting to certain persons therein named the right of preëmption to a section of land in Ottawa county, in the State of Michigan; and

A joint resolution to authorize the purchase of an island in the river Delaware, called the Pea Patch.

JOHN H. CLARK.

The bill for the relief of John H. Clark was considered, and on the question of its engrossment, it was decided in the negative.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

A bill for the relief of David Waller;

A bill confirming certain land claims in the State of Michigan;

A bill to authorize certain soldiers of the last war to surrender certain bounty lands, and to locate others in lieu thereof;

A bill for the relief of J. and W. Beeson; and

A bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made, under three several treaties between the United States and certain foreign Powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States.

CIRCUIT COURT IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill to explain and limit the powers of the circuit court of the District of Columbia coming up on its passage,

Mr. PRENTISS moved that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions; which were read.

Mr. PRESTON moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed; which was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Tallmadge—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—26.

Mr. PRESTON then addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill, and in favor of its recommitment.

The question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Tallmadge—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—27.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Tallmadge—15.

LANDS IN MISSOURI AND ARKANSAS.

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable the claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824, and the act amending the same, was taken up for consideration; and after some remarks from Messrs. LINN, BUCHANAN, MOUTON, BAYARD, SEVIER and CRITTENDEN, it was informally passed over.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839 was taken up; and after being amended so as to make provision for the construction of three steam vessels, was ordered to be engrossed.

AMERICA VESPUCCI.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of America Vespucci, made the following report thereon:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred so much of the petition of America Vespucci as relates to a grant of land, beg leave to report:

That, conceiving it to be their duty to verify the facts upon which the application was founded, they have examined a voluminous mass of documentary evidence, and find the statements of the memorial to be fully sustained. They have seen the authentic certificates of baptism, through many generations, of the Vespucci family in Florence, which attest the lineage and descent of the memorialist. They have read the highly favorable and complimentary letter of the Queen of the French, through her secretary, to the petitioner. They have read the letter to her of the King of the French, through the Minister of the Interior, subscribing for a work for the King, of which she was the author; and have also read the permission of the French Minister of the Marine for her to sail in a French national vessel. The committee have also had before them her credentials from the Minister of Tuscany in France, and many other papers of high character and authenticity in her favor. They have also witnessed her own personal deportment here, and the manner in which she has been received by the French legation; which, added to other testimonials, leave not a doubt of the identity of the memorialist, and the truth of her representations.

After the lapse, then, of more than three centuries, a descendant of the celebrated Americus Vesputius is amongst us. This heroic navigator, before, and also after, the close of the fifteenth century, landed upon the shores of the New World, among the most early and scientific of those who succeeded the great and preeminent Columbus in the discovery of this continent. A descriptive narrative of his several voyages was written and published by Americus, and Europe baptised with his name this mighty continent. This name can never now be abandoned. It is the name of our beloved country. It is associated with all the glories of the past, and the still brighter hopes of the future. It is written upon our national Constitution, and engraven upon the heart of every true American. Under this name we have succeeded in two struggles with the most formidable Power in Europe, and have so wonderfully augmented in population that, should the same ratio of increase continue for the future, the close of this century will find within our limits more than one hundred millions of people, and more than five millions within the single city of New York. In reflecting, then, with glory upon the name of America, can we forget the great navigator from whom we derived this proudest of earthly titles? A descendant of Americus is now here; a young, interesting, dignified, and accomplished lady, with a mind of the highest intellectual culture, and a heart beating with all our own enthusiasm in the cause of American and of human liberty. She feels that the name she bears is a prouder title than any that earthly monarchs can bestow, and she comes here asking of us a small corner of American soil, where she may pass the remainder of her days in this land of her adoption. She comes here as an exile, separated forever from her family and friends, a stranger, without a country and without a home, expelled from her native Italy for the avowal and maintenance of opinions favorable to free institutions, and an ardent desire for the establishment of her country's freedom. That she is indeed worthy of the name of America; that her heart is indeed imbued with American principles, and a fervent love of human liberty, is proved, in her case, by toils and perils and sacrifices worthy of the proudest days of antiquity, when the Roman and the Spartan matron were ever ready to surrender life itself to their country's service.

The petitioner desires the donation to her of a small tract of land by Congress. With every feeling of respect and kindness for the memorialist, a majority of the committee deem it impossible for this Government to make the grant. They think such a grant without a precedent, and that it would violate the spirit of those compacts by which the public domain was ceded to this Government. It is the unanimous and anxious desire of the committee that the petitioner should receive all the benefits and recognition that this Government can bestow. What this Government cannot do is within the power of the American people. They feel at least an equal pride and glory with us in the name of America. Throughout our wide-extended country, among all classes, this feeling is universal; and in the humblest cottage the poorest American feels that name—the name of his beloved country is a prouder title than any that adorns the monarch's brow, and that if he has no other property, this name, with all its great and glorious associations with the past and hopes for the future, is an all-sufficient heritage to transmit to his children. This generous, patriotic, and enlightened people will take into their own hands the case of America Vespucci. They will procure for her that home which she desires among us. They will do all that Congress is forbidden to do, and infinitely more than she asks or desires, and demonstrate to the world that the name of America, our country's name, is dear to us all, and shall be honored, respected and cherished in the person of the interesting exile from whose ancestor we derive the great and glorious title.

The report was ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which the subject of the construction of steam vessels had been referred, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before Congress several dispatches from his Excellency the Governor of Maine, with inclosures, communicating certain proceedings of the Legislature of that State, and a copy of the reply of the Secretary of State, made by my direction, together with a note from H. S. Fox, Esq., Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, with the answer of the Secretary of State to the same.

It will appear from those documents that a numerous band of lawless and desperate men, chiefly from the adjoining British provinces, but without the authority or sanction of the provincial government, had trespassed upon that portion of the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain which is watered by the river Aroostook, and claimed to belong to the State of Maine; and that they had committed extensive depredations there by cutting and destroying a very large quantity of timber. It will further appear that the Governor of Maine, having been officially apprised of the circumstance, had communicated it to the Legislature, with a recommendation of such provisions, in addition to those already existing by law, as would enable him to arrest the course of said depredations, disperse the trespassers, and secure the timber which they were about carrying away; that in compliance with a resolve of the Legislature, passed in pursuance of his recommendation, his Excellency had dispatched the land agent of the State, with a force deemed adequate to that purpose, to the scene of the alleged depredations, who, after accomplishing a part of his duty, was seized by a band of the trespassers, at a house claimed to be within the jurisdiction of Maine, whither he had repaired for the purpose of meeting and consulting with the land agent of the Province of New Brunswick, and conveyed as a prisoner to Frederickton, in that province, together with two other citizens of the State, who were assisting him in the discharge of his duty.

It will also appear that the Governor and Legislature of Maine, satisfied that the trespassers had acted in defiance of the laws of both countries, learning that they were in possession of arms, and anticipating (correctly, as the result has proved) that persons of their reckless and desperate character would set at naught the authority of the magistrates, without the aid of a strong force, had authorized the sheriff, and the officer appointed in the place of the land agent, to employ at the expense of the State, an armed posse, who had proceeded to the scene of these depredations, with a view to the entire dispersion or arrest of the trespassers, and the protection of the public property.

In the correspondence between the Governor of Maine and Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, which has grown out of these occurrences, and is likewise herewith communicated, the former is requested to recall the armed party advanced into the disputed territory for the arrest of trespassers, and is informed that a strong body of British troops is to be held in readiness to support and protect the authority and subjects of Great Britain in said territory. In answer to that request, the Provincial Governor is informed of the determination of the State of Maine to support the land agent and his party in the performance of their duty, and the same determination for the execution of which provision is made by a resolution of the State Legislature, is communicated by the Governor to the General Government.

The Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in calling upon the Governor of Maine for a recall of the land agent and his party from the disputed territory, and the British Minister in making a similar demand upon the Government of the United States, proceed upon the assumption that an agreement exists between the two nations conceding to Great Britain, until the final settlement of the boundary question, exclusive possession of, and jurisdiction over, the territory in dispute. The important bearing which such an agreement, if it existed, would have upon the condition and interests of the parties, and the influence it might have upon the adjustment of the dispute, are too obvious to allow the error upon which this assumption seems to rest to pass for a moment without correction. The answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Fox's note, will show the ground taken by the Government of the United States upon this point. It is believed that all the correspondence which has passed between the two Governments upon this subject has already been communicated to Congress, and is now on their files. An abstract of it, however, hastily prepared, accompanies this communication. It is possible that, in thus abridging a voluminous correspondence, commencing in 1825 and continuing to a very recent period, a portion may have been accidentally overlooked; but it is believed that nothing has taken place which would materially change the aspect of the question, as therein presented. Instead of sustaining the assumption of the British functionaries, that correspondence disproves the existence of any such agreement. It shows that the two Governments have differed not only in regard to the main question of title to the territory in dispute, but with reference also to the right of jurisdiction, and the fact of the actual exercise of it in different portions thereof. Always aiming at an amicable adjustment of the dispute, both parties have entertained and repeatedly urged upon each other a desire that each should exercise its rights, whatever it considered them to be, in such a manner as to avoid collision, and allay, to the greatest practicable extent, the excitement likely to grow out of the controversy. It was in pursuance of such an understanding that Maine and Massachusetts, upon the remonstrance of Great Britain, desisted from making sales of lands, and the General Government from the construction of a projected military road in a portion of the territory of which they claimed to have enjoyed the exclusive possession; and that Great Britain, on her part, in deference to a similar remonstrance from the United States, suspended the issue of licenses to cut timber in the territory in controversy, and also the survey and location of a railroad through a section of country over which she also claimed to have exercised exclusive jurisdiction.

The State of Maine had a right to arrest the depredations complained of; it belonged to her to judge of the exigency of the occasion calling for her interference; and it is presumed that had the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick been correctly advised of the nature of the proceedings of the State of Maine, he would not have regarded the transaction as requiring, on his part, any resort to force. Each party claiming a right to the territory, and hence to the exclusive jurisdiction over it, it is manifest that, to prevent the destruction of the timber by trespassers, acting against the authority of both, and at the same time avoid forcible collision between the contiguous Governments during the pendency of negotiations concerning the title, resort must be had to the mutual exercise of jurisdiction in such extreme cases, or to an amicable and temporary arrangement as to the limits within which it should be exercised by each party. The understanding supposed to exist between the United States and Great Britain has been found heretofore sufficient for that purpose, and I believe will prove so hereafter, if the parties on the frontier, directly interested in the question, are respectively governed by a just spirit of conciliation and forbearance. If it shall be found, as there is now reason to apprehend, that there is, in the modes of construing that understanding by the two Governments, a difference not to be reconciled, I shall not hesitate to propose to her Britannic Majesty's Government a distinct arrangement for the temporary and mutual exercise of jurisdiction, by means of which similar difficulties may in future be prevented.

But between an effort on the part of Maine to preserve the property in dispute from destruction by intruders, and a military occupation by that State of the territory, with a view to hold it by force, while the settlement is a subject of negotiation between the two Governments, there is an essential difference, as well in respect to the position of the State, as to the duties of the General Government. In a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the Governor of Maine, on the 1st of March last, giving a detailed statement of the steps which had been taken by the Federal Government to bring the controversy to a termination, and designed to apprise the Governor of that State of the views of the Federal Executive, in respect to the future, it was stated, that while the obligations of the Federal Government to do all in its power to effect the settlement of the boundary question were fully recognized, it had, in the event of being unable to do so specifically, by mutual consent, no other means to accomplish that object amicably, than by another arbitration, or by a commission with an umpire in the nature of an arbitration; and that in the event of all other measures failing the President would feel it his duty to submit another proposition to the Government of Great Britain, to refer the decision of the question to a third Power. These are still my views upon the subject; and until this step shall have been taken, I cannot think it proper to invoke the attention of Congress to other than amicable means for the settlement of the controversy, or to cause the military power of the Federal Government to be brought in aid of the State of Maine, in any attempt to effect that object by a resort to force.

On the other hand, if the authorities of New Brunswick should attempt to enforce the claim of exclusive jurisdiction set up by them, by means of a military occupation on their part of the disputed territory, I shall feel myself bound to consider the contingency provided by the Constitution as having occurred, on the happening of which a State has the right to call for the aid of the Federal Government to repel invasion.

I have expressed to the British Minister near this Government a confident expectation that the agents of the State of Maine, who have been arrested under an obvious misapprehension of the object of their mission, will be promptly released; and to the Governor of Maine that a similar course will be pursued in regard to the agents of the Province of New Brunswick. I have also recommended that any militia that may have been brought together by the State of Maine, from an apprehension of a collision with the Government or people of the British Province, will be voluntarily and peaceably disbanded.

I cannot allow myself to doubt that the results anticipated from these representations will be seasonably realized. The parties more immediately interested cannot but perceive that an appeal to arms, under existing circumstances, will not only prove fatal to their present interests, but would postpone, if not defeat, the attainment of the main objects which they have in view. The very incidents which have recently occurred will necessarily awaken the Governments to the importance of promptly adjusting a dispute, by which it is now made manifest that the peace of the two nations is daily and imminently endangered. This expectation is further warranted by the general forbearance which has hitherto characterized the conduct of the Government and people on both sides of the line. In the uniform patriotism of Maine, her attachment to the Union, her respect for the wishes of the people of her sister States, of whose interest in her welfare she cannot be unconscious, and, in the solicitude felt by the country at large for the preservation of peace with our neighbors, we have a strong guarantee that she will not disregard the request that has been made of her.

As, however, the session of Congress is about to terminate, and the agency of the Executive may become necessary during the recess, it is important that the attention of the Legislature should be drawn to the consideration of such measures as may be calculated to obviate the necessity of a call for an extra session. With that view, I have thought it my duty to lay the whole matter before you, and to invite such action thereon as you may think the occasion requires.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 26th February, 1839.

A very interesting discussion followed, in which Messrs. BUCHANAN, WEBSTER, DAVIS, CLAY of Kentucky, WALKER, NORVELL, and WILLIAMS of Maine, participated; when,

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, five thousand additional copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, gave notice that to-morrow he would call up a bill for the organization of a volunteer corps for the defense of the inland and maritime frontier.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted a resolution that the Senate would to-morrow go into the election of a printer, and asked that it be considered now.

Mr. DAVIS objecting, the resolution lies over. The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 26, 1839.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the report of the select committee on the public lands, the question being on the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON.

Mr. YELL said that there were but a few days of the session left for the transaction of business indispensable to the support of the Government; that it was now apparent that no action could be had during this session, and he would not trespass another morning upon the business of the nation, &c. He stated the positions which induced him to oppose the resolution, in addition to those advanced on a former day: First that the public lands, under the deeds of cession, were set apart for the payment of the national debt, which amounted, at the close of the war, to eighty million. That debt has been paid; and if you please, by the proceeds of the public lands, or rather the whole amount of the sales amounts to about one hundred and six million, out of which amount about thirty million has been expended in surveying and paying all necessary expenses and salaries. But it must be recollected that this funded debt was paid as well out of the common treasure as the proceeds of the public lands. Secondly, that, from the estimate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, there has been about sixty million paid for the purchase under the treaties with Florida and Spain and the extinguishment of Indian titles. That must be paid before the proceeds can be diverted from their original purpose. The money was taken out of the public Treasury to acquire these titles, and it thereby became a part of the revenue, and could no more be applied in distribution than money raised from customs upon imports.

Mr. Y. took a brief survey of the grounds assigned, and finally closed with his objections to the passage of the resolution, because the state of the Treasury would not justify it, and because the effect would be to raise the tariff, or a resort to direct taxation to make up the deficiency, which he estimated to be ten million, or more, and which, moreover, would fall heavily upon the western States, as they were the consumers, and paid the duties in the end.

[Mr. Y.'s speech in full will be published as soon as it is prepared for the press.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, on the ground of want of time to act deliberately upon the subject, moved to lay the report and resolutions upon the table.

Mr. HAYNES asked the gentleman to withdraw the motion to allow him to make a brief explanation. His position was a peculiar one, for his constituency had been assailed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] and he wished to place himself right before the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, declined.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused; and the whole subject was laid on the table without a division.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

The question immediately pending was the motion of Mr. OGLE to strike out the appropriations for the branch mints, and to devote a sum of $600 to each, for a man to take charge of them.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee against the amendment, and especially in reply to Mr. OGLE's remarks last night.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, also advocated the propriety of continuing the branch mints.

Mr. ROBERTSON sustained the amendment, and said he should have moved it, or one similar to it, had it not been moved by a gentleman from the North. He expressed his surprise that any southern man, opposed to the protection of manufactures, should support these branch manufacturing for gold, when they had one before capable of doing all the business of the country.

Mr. DAWSON expressed his surprise at this having been made by the advocates of the amendment a party measure, and no less so at an effort to cut off, in its infancy, before it had scarcely gone into operation, works like these. He confined his remarks to the branch at Dahlonega, the necessity of which he warmly insisted upon.

Mr. GRAHAM was in favor of the continuation of the branches.

Mr. EVERETT thought this an improper occasion to abolish the branch mints—that it should be brought forward as a separate measure. On such an occasion the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] would be entitled to great consideration. He thought, at least, it was an unsafe course to introduce subjects of legislation into appropriation bills. So long as the law establishing these mints remained, he thought that the annual appropriations for their support should be made. He said this, although he had voted against their establishment. Many of his friends, however, voted for them, no doubt on the ground on which they were then, as now, advocated—as a measure of protection to domestic industry. It was then, as now, urged that their establishment would increase the value of gold in the section of country where produced. On this point the North had no constitutional scruples; and he was glad to find that, on that occasion, none were expressed by the South. He had voted against it principally on the ground that the establishment of different mints tended to produce a variation of value. He had thought, to preserve a perfect unity of value, there should be but one mint.

Mr. STANLEY made a reply to Mr. MONTGOMERY, in opposition to the mint at Charlotte; and threw out an intimation that the proceedings were not very honestly conducted there, particularly in reference to the wastage of gold, or contingent expenses.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that, strictly speaking, this amendment was not in order, because they could not repeal one law and enact another upon an appropriation.

Mr. MERCER advocated the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BYNUM said he should not have said a word, but for the peculiar relation in which he stood to the question under consideration. He regarded the question of more importance than it might at first appear to possess. The proposition was, in his mind, an insidious one, and wore the "ear-mark" (to use the language of a friend of his) of the party, and system of the party, whence it came; and he would show that it sprang from the very source from which such a motion should. The proposition to strike out all appropriations for the branch mints in the South, he would show, sprang from one who stood in need of a "straight jacket" by far more than did those who voted to establish the mints, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania had denounced all who voted for that bill as such. Now, sir, what does the member ask by the proposition? To stop all appropriations for the southern mints, and, consequently, by this indirect blow, strike them down, after having, in the short space of six months, been established, without giving them the least trial to test their utility; and this he would have us do without furnishing one single additional fact more than was known at their establishment. Not a single new fact has he presented to justify this House in striking down those institutions which, but a few years ago, were established by a vote of 115 to 60, lacking five only of being two to one. Does the gentleman think that there is so much stupidity in this House to do such a thing, in absence of additional evidence of the impolicy of the erection of those institutions? Were we to do it, we should truly deserve the epithets that the member, in his assumed wisdom, has applied to us. Before we attempt such a thing, why did not the gentleman make proper calls on the Department for all the information necessary to justify the voting for such a proposition? Sir, does he think, by such "lunatics," to adopt such a proposition, without these necessary and usual calls? And to require the House to do such an act, shows much more clearly that he himself stands more in want of a "straight jacket" than others.

That this is an insidious attack is evident, in my mind, because it comes directly from a source that is the natural enemy to everything that is connected with a money currency for the use of the laboring, productive people of this country, who live by industry and labor, and not by their corporate privileges and rights exclusively to issue paper in the name of money for the use of the people, and often without a particle of intrinsic value attached to it. It is this stuff that it is wished, by these privileged orders, to pass instead of money, and upon their credit and promises, as often as they choose to break them. It is for such stuff that they wish the people to work and labor, and with which they would buy the produce of our industry. This step is one of their old tricks again; it is a piece of that old craft family, that have been the curse of every age, to get produce and labor without returning for it a valuable consideration.

Yes, sir; paper money is the natural enemy of labor, industry, and every species of produce and agriculture. Those mints were established for the especial benefit of the laborer and productive industry, and to aid in establishing for them, as far as they could effect it, a currency founded on a valuable consideration, and not subject to eternal fluctuation and depreciation; and for this cause alone have they become an "eye sore," and are so bitterly denounced by the friends of this non-productive, non-laboring party, who have been so long wont to live upon their incorporate privileges, and eat the bread of idleness. Yes, sir; for this reason will those institutions ever be opposed by the drones of this consumptive, non-productive party. The member wants the laborers who make this gold to go to Philadelphia to get their money coined; to pay their own expenses from the backwoods of North Carolina and Georgia, and the whole West and South, to the great Mecca of the paper currency, to get the stamp of the holy father before they can use their money, or be under the necessity of selling to speculators at from ten to fifteen per cent.; men sent on there by his holiness, or some of his stockjobbing junto at the capital of the holy land. Does the gentleman think that the honest laborer will not see through all this craft, and I like to have said folly, for such it is in fact, as much wisdom as the gentleman may think there is in it? By keeping up these mints and carrying on your coinage among the people, this gold and silver, much of it, indeed, would be left with the people who make and use it; but carry it to Philadelphia, and your bank will do, what it ever has done, seize on every dollar of it that it can, and substitute for it its own paper and promises to pay.

Again, I have no idea of any one place monopolizing the coinage of money, or any other thing. I am against all such exclusive privileges in a free country; and there are considerations, most powerful in my mind, of this character, that will induce me to vote against the novel and unprecedented motion to cut down those institutions.

Let gentlemen alone, and they would have us to go to this Mecca of paper promises, for our apparel, our rights—and some would have gone there for our political opinions, our morals, religion, and manners even. Sir, we are hardly to be considered "decent," unless we have visited this holy father, and dipped our corrupted hands in his sacred fountain. No man possesses learning, or intelligence—is a scholar, or an orator, unless he has the certificate from this capital of exclusive privileges. All is vulgar, but what is sanctioned by their criticism. But it does not stop here; they have assumed, assumed, sir, even to decide who are to be considered gentlemen, and to be worthy of notice. Such is the preposterous arrogance of these advocates of exclusive privileges. The very idea is not more insulting than disgusting, as you pursue it.

I am sorry that the conduct of the Governor of North Carolina has been quoted by this party, to justify them in their striking down those institutions. It was but what might have been expected, however, from the contents of his message to the last Legislature.

Sir, it was well calculated to aid and excite the enemies of that State to strike at her most favorite institution, and prostrate her dearest interest, as a Democratic Republican productive State. I protest, however, against his views in relation to this subject being taken here as evidence of those of a majority of that patriotic State. Sir, it was not the only question that the Governor did not speak out on before the last election, in which he succeeded in that State. Yes, sir, it is believed by many that he purposely concealed his opinions on many other subjects, until he had succeeded in his election. Yes, sir, and by this means a deception was practiced on that too-confiding people, the like of which never had been before played on them by any man or set of men; and, sir, the people of that high and patriotic State will feel humiliated when they learn, by such a message, their Governor had become a favorite and a subject of eulogy by an Antimasonic Abolitionist of this House, and that his principles find favor alone with such, and those who would give them indirect aid here. Long, long should that abused people remember the evidences this day elicited in this House of the conduct and principles of their Governor. But he has got from them his all; he never will dare to appear before them again. Upon this subject I am responsible, sir, for what I speak, here or elsewhere. I regret, deeply regret, having the conduct of the Governor of the State that I represent, in part, thrown in my teeth here from such a source. Soon may we expect the conduct of some of the Abolitionists from the same State thrown at us here, as evidence against us, as to the triumphant progress of their bloody and assassin-like schemes to the South. I feel humbled at such a state of things, coming from whatever quarter it may.

The member from Pennsylvania has dwelt much on the "gold humbug," the "gold humbug" used by the Democratic party for mere deception, to gull and dupe and delude the people. Now, sir, in this the member is guilty of the error of his whole party. They give the strongest evidence against themselves. If the attempt to place our currency upon a specie basis, and make it a permanent one, for the benefit of the productive and laboring interests, to thwart the views of speculators, bankers, and stockjobbers—if it all was a mere "humbug," I say, sir, why these mighty, these Herculean, these dying struggles, made in every section of your country, both in and out of this House, to prevent it? Why those indefatigable efforts, here and elsewhere, to thwart it, to impede it, and strangle it at every step that is taken on that subject? Do those deathlike efforts alone not give the most palpable and incontrovertible contradiction to all their ideas of its being a "humbug?" Could anything afford a more clear demonstration of their belief of its being no "humbug," than such solicitude and indefatigable efforts on their part to resist it? Is this evidence not clear of the grossest attempt on their part to practice a deception on the people, and make them believe what their every act furnishes the most clear demonstration that they do not themselves?

Mr. THOMPSON regarded the establishment of these mints as an extraordinary piece of legislation. The establishing these branch mints in the places where located was novel and unprecedented. There was no practical necessity for them; and, as a southern man and patriot, he deprecated the practice of digging gold from the bowels of the earth; that it had desolated and ruined every country that ever undertook to carry on this species of mining. Could he prevent it, he never would have another dollar dug. Mr. T. concluded at the suggestion of Mr. HOWARD, who stated to the committee that a message from the President of the United States, of an important character, was now in waiting, and hoped the committee would rise, to enable the House to receive the same, and have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The committee, at this suggestion, accordingly rose, and reported progress.

MAINE BOUNDARY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States in relation to the difficulties on the Maine frontier, accompanied by voluminous documents from the Governor of Maine; also, communications from the Secretary of State to Mr. Fox, the British Minister, and his replies thereto.

Mr. HOWARD moved that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be printed; and that the committee have liberty to sit during the sittings of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the printing of twenty thousand extra copies; and supported the motion by a speech, in which he highly commended the message; and which, together with the rest of this highly interesting debate, will be given hereafter.

Mr. PEARCE, of Maryland, briefly replied to some remarks of Mr. Thompson, which he considered as reflecting, in an offensive manner, upon the House.

Mr. THOMPSON explained.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, followed in a long and very animated speech, in which he gave a full history of the present difficulty in that State from its origin; stated minutely its present condition; commented with some severity on the neglect which had been shown by the General Government to the oft-repeated representations of that State, in which the present crisis had been represented as inevitable; and insisted that it was evident, from the whole tone of the message, that the urgency of the case was not appreciated.

Mr. HOWARD remonstrated against this crimination of the Government as necessarily leading to a defensive reply, and thus tending to withdraw the attention of the House to a collateral subject, and diverting it from the deeply interesting subject of the message.

Mr. EVANS proceeded some time longer; and when he sat down,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question. [Loud cries of "No, no!" "Withdraw it! Withdraw it!" from all parts of the House.]

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his motion.

Mr. ADAMS then addressed the House indorsing fully the speech of Mr. EVANS, but suggesting a constitutional difficulty in relation to the advice of the President to the Governor of Maine to enter into an explanation and accommodation with the Governor of New Brunswick, &c., as a thing which the Governor of a State was not authorized to do; and expressed his hope that an agent of the Government would be appointed to manage such an arrangement, should it take place, &c.

Mr. CRARY moved the previous question.

Mr. LINCOLN requested him to withdraw the motion, but he refused to comply.

The question being taken by tellers, on seconding the motion, it was rejected—yeas 48, nays 89. Mr. LINCOLN then addressed the House, and after warm commendations of the message, went at large into the general subject.

He was succeeded by Mr. CUSHING, who strenuously denied the existence of any agreement between the two Governments that, pending the controversy, Great Britain was to hold exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and adverted to the aggressive claims of that Government, her course toward the Indians, and on the northwestern coast, &c.

Mr. WHITTLESEY demanded the previous question; which was seconded, put, carried, and the question of reference agreed to without a division.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the Committee on Foreign Affairs had leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. BRONSON moved to print twenty thousand copies of these documents.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, objected to the consideration of the resolution at this time; and, at the suggestion of several gentlemen that it would be better to print them with the report of the committee, Mr. Bronson did not press his motion.

DEFALCATIONS OF SWARTWOUT.

Mr. HARLAN asked leave to report from the select committee appointed to inquire into the defalcations of Swartwout and others.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he must object to anything interposing to prevent the action of the House on the appropriation bill. Moreover, the committee had risen for the sole purpose of receiving the President's message on the Maine question; and that having been disposed of, the unfinished business should be resumed.

Mr. HARLAN thereupon moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 85, nays 59.

Not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill; the pending question still being on striking out the appropriations for the branch mints of North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana, and providing salaries for persons to supervise the public property thereat.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that he would remain here all night, and move a call of the House, rather than again rise without closing the amendments on this bill.

The debate was continued at great length by Messrs. OGLE, BYNUM, GRAHAM, and RENCHER.

Mr. CAMBRELENG appealed to the House to take the question, and let the bill be reported. And the question on the amendment was taken, and rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERS proposed to amend the bill by adding a provision requiring the collectors of customs to deposit the money coming into their hands to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, subject to warrant, &c.

The CHAIRMAN said that if there was any objection, he should pronounce this amendment out of order.

Mr. CHAMBERS supposed no gentleman would object.

Mr. PETRIKIN alluded to the short space of time left, and objected.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Then let the gentleman take the responsibility. I now move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, so that the gentleman will gain no time on the score of debate, by objecting to this amendment.

Some remarks followed from Messrs. CHAMBERS, CAMBRELENG, and PETRIKIN.

Mr. CHAMBERS withdrew his motion to strike out the enacting clause, and again offered his amendment for the purpose of taking an appeal.

But, on the suggestion of Mr. MERCER, Mr. C. withdrew the amendment, with the intention to move a suspension of the rule in the House, for the purpose of offering it there.

Mr. HALSTED moved to amend the bill by providing that no part of the contingent fund of the Post Office Department should be expended in paying for the dinners of the clerks; which was rejected.

Mr. H. moved further to amend the bill by reducing the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Senate to $30,000; which was rejected.

Mr. GRAVES offered an amendment, the effect of which would be to reduce a certain class of clerks in the Post Office, who now enjoyed an advantage over others by having had ten per cent. added to their salaries, to the same level with the rest, by taking off twenty per cent. from what they now received.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. CAMBRELENG, and rejected.

After an ineffectual attempt by Mr. RIVES to get an amendment to increase the salaries of collectors of the smaller ports of the Union, with especial reference to the collector at Petersburg, Virginia,

The committee rose and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. CHAMBERS offered an amendment, the effect of which would be to prohibit any collector from retaining in his hands moneys paid under protest, and requiring him to deposit the same in bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

The amendment was adopted.

The House then concurred in the amendments reported from the committee, save a few which were reserved for discussion, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. BELL moved an adjournment; but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. EVANS, who, by leave, laid on the table a communication from Governor Fairfield to the Legislature of Maine, which, he observed, presented a very critical state of things there. The reading was dispensed with, and the document ordered to be printed for the information of the members.

Mr. JENIFER, on leave, offered a resolution calling for certain information in relation to the tobacco trade.

A bill in explanation of a bill for the reorganization of the United States Marine Corps was read twice and committed.

Mr. EWING asked leave to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana on the subject of slavery; but it was objected to, and leave was refused.

Mr. DAWSON, from a select committee, made a report on certain claims of the State of Georgia; which was read and referred.

Mr. BEATTY moved an adjournment, (about half past ten o'clock.)

Mr. HARLAN requested him to withdraw it, that he might present a report from the investigating committee on the Swartwout defalcation.

Mr. BEATTY refusing, Mr. HARLAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 45, nays 52.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOPKINS moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. BEIRNE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE remonstrated. All the committee desired was to get the report out of their hands into those of the printer.

Mr. MERCER hoped the report would be received, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOPKINS withdrew his motion for a call.

Mr. OWENS stated that the report of the minority would be ready in the morning; and it being understood that both reports should be presented simultaneously to-morrow morning, the House (a few minutes before eleven o'clock) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1839.

Mr. McKEAN presented the memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, praying a further appropriation for the completion of the lighthouse on Brandywine shoals; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of A. B.

Patterson and others, citizens of Warren county, Illinois, praying the establishment of a post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of a number of the citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying the entire repeal of the naturalization laws now in force, and the passage of other laws to prevent the indiscriminate influx of foreign emigrants; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which, after some remarks from Messrs. PIERCE, MOUTON, PRESTON, HUBBARD, and BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be allowed, and paid out of the contingent fund, for extra services, to each of the messengers of the Senate and office, $250; to each of the pages, $200; and to each of the assistant messengers and laborers, $200.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. TALLMADGE, was taken up for consideration, and adopted:

Whereas, the Senate, on the 12th day of February instant, passed a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General communicate to the Senate the number of removals of deputy postmasters since the 4th March, 1837; the names of the persons so removed, and times when removed; the names of the persons appointed to fill the vacancies; the names of the offices where such removals have been made; classing the whole by States and Territories.

And whereas, no answer has been received to the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Postmaster General inform the Senate, without delay, why he has not communicated the information required by that resolution.

The joint resolution fixing the value of the pound in money of the British Provinces in North America at our custom-houses, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, by unanimous consent, read the third time and passed.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WRIGHT, yesterday, fixing half past twelve o'clock to go into an election for printer, was considered and agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Philip Weedman; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill to provide for the defense of the western frontier, from the mouth of the Sabine to Fort Snelling, on the Mississippi river, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred an act for the relief of Lewis B. Willis, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the following acts, reported the same, severally, without amendment:

An act for the relief of Francis Mallaby;
An act for the relief of Griffith Combe and John P. Ingle, trustees of the house in the city of Washington, commonly called the Brick Capitol;

An act for the relief of A. J. Pickett, and George W. Gayle; and

An act for the relief of James W. Cox.

Mr. SWIFT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of William Dickinson, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The joint resolution providing for the purchase of an island in the Delaware, called the Pea Patch;

The bill to provide for additional clerks in the Post Office Department, and the Auditor's office connected therewith;

The bill granting a pension to Hannah Leighton;

The bill for the relief of John Ritchie;

The bill for the relief of John L. Scott;

The bill granting to certain persons therein named the right of preemption to a tract of land in Ottawa county, Michigan;

The bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodd;

The bill for the relief of Daniel B. Bush;

The bill to authorize the inhabitants of township eight north, range thirty-two west, in the State of Arkansas, to enter a section of land in lieu of the sixteenth section in said township, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes;

The bill to authorize the location of the pre-emption certificates given by the register of the land office at Batesville, in Arkansas, under the act of the 26th of May, 1824, on any of the public lands for sale in the State of Arkansas;

The bill for the relief of Richard Robinson;

The bill for the relief of the widow and other heirs of Alexander Hamilton, deceased;

The bill for the relief of John Burk;

The bill for the relief of Josephine Nourse;

An act for the erection of light-houses, light-boats, beacons, and buoys;

An act for the relief of James H. Ralston;

An act for the relief of Samuel McKay;

An act for the relief of John W. Kearney;

An act for the relief of John McFarland; and

The bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1839.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

At half past twelve o'clock, in pursuance of the resolution on the subject, adopted this morning, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a Printer; and the result was as follows:

On the first ballot, forty-three ballots were given; of which

Blair & Rives had.....	25
Gales & Seaton.....	11
Ogden Niles.....	4
Thomas Allen.....	2
	43

Blair & Rives, therefore, having a majority of the whole number of votes given, were declared by the Chair to be duly elected.

LIGHT-HOUSES, ETC.

The bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, beacons, and buoys, was ordered to be engrossed.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

The bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections was taken up; when Mr. CRITTENDEN addressed the Senate for upwards of two hours and a half in defense of the bill, and was replied to by Mr. WALL.

Mr. NILES and Mr. PRESTON followed in the debate, and the question was taken on the amendment to the bill offered by Mr. CRITTENDEN, and decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, and White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—25.

Mr. TALLMADGE then offered to amend the bill by making its provisions and penalties applicable only to the officeholders named when they shall subscribe sums of money to carry on elections; which was lost—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, and White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—26.

Mr. RIVES then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to amend the bill so as to conform to the resolutions which he had submitted to the Senate some time since; which was lost—yeas 13, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, and White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—25.

The question then came up on the engrossment of the bill, which is as follows:

A bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections.

To the end that the great powers given to the officers of the Federal Government, and other persons employed in its service, may not be used for the influencing of elections, which ought to be free and incontestable:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of April, in the year 1839, no marshal or deputy marshal, no postmaster or deputy postmaster, no receiver or register of a land office, or any other deputies or clerks, no surveyor general of the public lands, or any of his deputies or assistants, no collector, surveyor, naval officer, weigher, gauger, appraiser, or other officer or person whatsoever concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, levying, or managing the customs, or any branch or part thereof, no engineer, officer, or agent, employed or concerned in the execution or superintendence of any of the public works, shall, by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner whatsoever, endeavor to persuade any elector to give, or dissuade any elector from giving, his vote for the choice of any person to be elector of President and Vice President of these United States, or for the choice of any person to be a Senator or Representative in the Congress of the said United States, or the choice of any person to be Governor or Lieutenant Governor of any State, or of any person to be a representative or member in the legislative department of any State of this Union, or for the choice of any person to serve in any public office established by the law of any of said States; nor shall any such officer or person intermeddle in any of the elections above mentioned, or use any means with intent to influence or control the same, otherwise than by giving his own vote; and every person offending therein shall forfeit the sum of $500; one moiety thereof to the informer, and the other moiety thereof to the United States aforesaid, to be recovered, with costs of suit, by any person that shall sue for the same, by action of debt, bill, or plaint in any of the district or circuit courts of the United States; and every person convicted, on any such suit, of the said offense, shall thereby become disabled and incapable of ever bearing or executing any office or place of trust whatsoever under the said United States.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, gave his reasons why he could not support the bill; and the question being taken on its engrossment, was decided in the negative—yeas 5, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Foster, Merrick, Preston, and White—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—28.

So the bill was lost.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted the following message from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1839.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of various other documents received from the Governor of Maine, relating to the dispute between that State and the Province of New Brunswick, which formed the subject of my message of the 30th instant, and also a copy of a memorandum signed by the Secretary of State of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States, of the terms upon which it is believed all collision can be avoided on the frontier, consistently with, and respecting the claims on either side. As the British Minister acts without specific authority from his Government, it will be observed that this memorandum has but the force of recommendation on the provincial authorities and on the government of the State.

M. VAN BUREN.

MEMORANDUM.

Her Majesty's authorities consider it to have been understood and agreed upon by the two Governments that the territory in dispute between Great Britain and the United States, on the northeastern frontier, should remain exclusively under British jurisdiction until the final settlement of the boundary question.

The United States Government have not understood the above agreement in the same sense, but consider, on the contrary, that there has been no agreement whatever for the exercise by Great Britain of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, or any portion thereof, but a mutual understanding that, pending the negotiation, the jurisdiction then exercised by either party, over small portions of the territory in dispute, should not be enlarged, but be continued merely for the preservation of local tranquility and the public property, both forbearing, as far as practicable, to exert any authority, and, when any should be exercised by either, placing upon the conduct of each other the most favorable construction.

A complete understanding upon the question thus placed at issue, of present jurisdiction, can only be arrived at by friendly discussion between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain; and, as it is confidently hoped that there will be an early settlement of the question, this subordinate point of difference can be of but little moment.

In the meantime, the Governor of the State of Maine will act as follows: Her Majesty's officers will seek to expel, by military force, the armed party which has been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Aroostook river; but the Government of Maine will voluntarily, and without needless delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force now within them; and if future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation by armed force, the operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreements between the Governments of Maine and New Brunswick.

The civil officers in the service respectively of New Brunswick and Maine, who have been taken into custody by the opposite parties, shall be released.

Nothing in this memorandum shall be construed to fortify or to weaken, in any respect whatever, the claim of either party to the ultimate possession of the disputed territory.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty having no specific authority to make any arrangement on the subject, the undersigned can only recommend, as they now earnestly do, to the Governments of New Brunswick and Maine, to regulate their future proceedings according to the terms herein set forth, until the final settlement of the territorial dispute, or until the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall come to some definite conclusion on the subordinate point upon which they are now at issue.

JOHN FORSYTH,

Secretary of State of the United States of North America.

H. S. FOX,

Her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary.

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1839.

After some remarks from Messrs. WILLIAMS of Maine, PRESTON, DAVIS, RUGGLES, WEBSTER, BROWN, WALKER, and CALHOUN, the message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and five thousand additional copies ordered to be printed.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839, was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1839.

Mr. HARLAN, from the select committee appointed on the 17th of January last to inquire and report as to the defalcations of public officers, made a report; when

Mr. OWENS, of the same committee, on behalf of the minority, by leave, submitted a report containing the views of the minority upon the subject-matters committed to the committee.

Mr. HARLAN, on behalf of the committee, moved the reading of the conclusions of the committee; and that five thousand copies of the reports with the journal, and twenty thousand copies of the reports without the journal, be printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he was not opposed to printing, but he objected to the reading, unless all the reports were read. And he called for the reading, accordingly.

Some conversation followed in different parts of the House, of which little could be heard, owing to the extreme confusion.

The SPEAKER decided that it was a parliamentary right to call for the reading; and, after some further conversation on points of order,

The Clerk proceeded to read the report of the majority.

The reading was frequently interrupted by attempts to suspend it; after some time,

On motion of Mr. OWENS, all the reports (by general consent) were laid on the table; and five thousand copies thereof, with the journal, and twenty thousand copies of both documents, without the journal, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALL, from the select committee appointed on the 24th of January to inquire into the character and amount of proof which is required by existing laws and regulations to establish claims on the United States for revolutionary services in the Virginia Continental and State lines and navy, and whether any, and what, further legislative provisions be necessary in regard to the mode of adjusting and allowing claims for such services, made a report thereon adverse to further appropriation for the satisfaction of said warrants; and moved that it be laid on the table, and that the report and documents be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO asked for a division of the question.

Mr. WISE urged that the question should not be taken now, as a colleague of his, and a member of the committee, (not now in his seat,) was preparing his protest against this report, by which great injustice, he contended, was done; and he wished to have that protest printed, together with the report.

The report was laid on the table.

The question recurring on the motion to print, Some remarks followed from Messrs. TALIAFERRO, CRAIG, HALL, and WISE.

Mr. STANLY, with a view to save the time of the House, now so precious, moved to lay the motion to print on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS, as a member of the committee, appealed to Mr. STANLY to withdraw the motion.

Mr. STANLY not consenting,

Mr. GRENNELL asked the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the motion to print on the table, which were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 43, nays 127.

So the motion to lay the motion to print on the table was rejected.

And the question recurring on the motion to print,

Before further action was taken, the Speaker announced the expiration of the morning hour.

HOURLY MEETING.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, on leave, offered a resolution fixing the hour of meeting at ten o'clock, and providing that the House take a recess from three to half past four o'clock.

Some amendments being offered,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question; which was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

And the resolution was adopted, (and takes effect as to the recess this day.)

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of the Commissary General of the Army and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, together with document No. 78 of the House of Representatives, second session of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, containing the information called for by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th ultimo.

A letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st January last, calling for information as to the number of Cherokee Indians now residing in North Carolina, &c.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the information required by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th ultimo, in relation to the improvement of Little Egg harbor.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions from the Legislature of Massachusetts, on the subject of the salt duty; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUSHMAN, on leave, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to compensate certain officers of the customs for the year 1839; which was read twice and committed.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of this bill, which had been reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the question being on concurring in certain amendments made thereto in committee, and which had been reserved for special question.

The first amendment was that proposed by Mr. ADAMS, and passed in committee, that the aggregate amount of all the items of appropriation in the bill be set forth in the first clause thereof.

Some debate followed, in which Messrs. CAMBRELENG, ADAMS, and BELL participated.

When, the question being taken, the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. BELL, for the purpose of making some general remarks, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. B. then addressed the House on the actual condition and resources of the country at the present time, and the inertness and want of energy in the heads of the General Government, as illustrated by the state of our different frontiers.

Mr. BRONSON defended the Administration, and especially with reference to its measures on the Canadian frontier.

Mr. BELL then withdrew his motion.

The question recurred on concurring in the second amendment made in committee, and reserved for special question, which was to reduce the item for the contingent expenses of the pay and mileage, &c., of the Territory of Iowa to $27,575.

Some debate followed, in which Messrs. CHAPMAN and LEADBETTER participated.

And the question was not taken, when, pursuant to its order, the House took a recess until half past four o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met after recess; and the general appropriation bill being still under consideration,

Mr. LEADBETTER concluded his remarks in reply to Mr. CHAPMAN, on striking out the item of $16,000 for certain arrearages in the pay of the members of the Legislature of Iowa.

Mr. CHAPMAN replied; when the amendment was concurred in, and the amendment stricken out.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked him to withdraw the motion, reminding him of a pledge given by him on a former day that he would not make this motion till Mr. G. should have had an opportunity of renewing in the House certain amendments moved by him in committee.

Mr. CAMBRELENG denied that he was under any such pledge.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, replied with great warmth, and in somewhat intemperate terms, which, however, were indistinctly heard by the reporter amidst the cries of "Order!" "Order!" and the general confusion of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved a call of the House; which motion prevailing, the House was called. One hundred and twenty-nine members having answered to their names, the absentees were called, when one hundred and fifty seven members were found to be present.

The call was then suspended.

The previous question was seconded by yeas and nays—yeas 113, nays 47. It was then put, and carried.

Mr. CONNOR demanded the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them.

The bill was then read the third time by its title, and passed.

Mr. GARLAND apologized to the House for the intemperate expressions he had used towards Mr. CAMBRELENG, stating that the latter had come to his seat and stated that he had forgotten having given the pledge, though afterwards convinced it had been given, as stated by Mr. G.

[Cries of "Well done!" "Handsome!"]

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

A message was now received from the President of the United States, on the subject of our difficulties in Maine, accompanied by a memorandum signed by Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox, proposing a conciliatory course to be pursued by New Brunswick and Maine.

Mr. EVANS addressed the House in a course of remarks expressive of his fears that this proposal had come too late to prevent the effusion of blood. He moved that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Two other messages were received and referred.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Navy appropriation bill having come back from the Senate with some amendments,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

On motion of Mr. C., the House then went into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. INGHAM in the chair,) and took up the bill to prevent and suppress Indian hostilities.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to insert after the appropriating clause the words "amounting to $1,804,774;" which was agreed to.

After the adoption of some other slight amendments,

Mr. EVERETT moved an item of $5,000 to cover the expenses of a treaty with the Seminole Indians, should the President see fit to enter into one. He supported the amendment in a speech in which he adverted to the large sums which had been expended in the vain effort to expel these Indians from Florida, and stated the probability, from information he had received, that if negotiations were entered into, the remnant now there would be content to retire within an ascertained line, &c.

The amendment gave rise to an extended debate, in which Messrs. EVERETT, DOWNING, FILLMORE, ROBERTSON, CRABB, MONTGOMERY, MERCER, and PUTNAM took part; which resulted in the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BELL moved to insert an amendment appropriating $50,000 to pay for horses which had been taken into Florida by volunteers, and detained there by order of United States officers, and then turned over, by the owners, to the United States.

On this amendment a long and desultory debate took place, in which Messrs. BELL, PETRIKIN, EWING, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, ROBERTSON, ELMORE, GRENNELL, and CHAPMAN participated.

Mr. ROBERTSON made the point of order, that the law having expired which authorized these expenditures, the amendment, under the rule of the House, was out of order.

Mr. McKAY inquired whether a bill had not been reported from the Committee of Claims covering these cases?

A reply having been given in the negative,

The point of order was debated by Mr. TURNEY, who contended that even though the law of 1837 had expired, yet there was a general law under which the amendment was in order. And Mr. T. went into an examination of the amendment, and urged its adoption.

The amendment was debated further by Mr. McKAY.

Mr. BELL modified his amendment so as to conform to the words of the law.

Mr. ROBERTSON called the attention of the Chair to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN decided the amendment to be in order.

The amendment was further debated by Messrs. HARRISON and RUSSELL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asked that this bill be laid aside, in order that some of the many other bills before the House might be taken up. He alluded to the great loss of time in debate, and to the excellent practice in the British House of Commons of coughing members down on certain occasions—a rule which he thought might be most properly applied here. He was willing, however, that the pending question should be taken.

Mr. ELMORE moved to amend the amendment so as to include horses that have died in consequence of the failure of the Government to furnish proper support and forage, or from injuries sustained while in the service, where they have died after their owners were discharged from service.

Some further remarks were made by Messrs. BELL, RUSSELL, and ELMORE.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—ayes 32, noes 91.

Mr. GRANTLAND moved an amendment appropriating $85,000 to refund to the State of Georgia money expended for pay and subsistence of troops called into service to repel an invasion of Indians near Okefenoke swamp.

A document from the War Department was read in relation to this subject.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was then laid aside.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. GRANT moved that the committee take up the bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, for the year 1839; which motion was rejected—ayes 57, noes 74.

PAY OF PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. MORGAN moved to take up the bill to authorize the Secretary of War to allow compensation to pension agents; which motion was rejected.

POST OFFICE BUILDING.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the committee took up the bill providing for the erection of a fire-proof building for the use of the General Post Office Department.

A letter from the Postmaster General, showing the necessity of this building, having been read,

Mr. THOMAS said that this was not a time to enter into a debate, and if the occasion justified it he was not disposed to do so. He would say that he was satisfied in his own mind that this building ought to be of marble, large quantities of which were to be found in Washington county, Maryland, near the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal; in Baltimore county, in the same State; in Pennsylvania, and in other parts of the United States. He had taken some pains to ascertain the character of the marble in Washington county. Several years ago he had prevailed upon the Committee on Public Buildings to send into that county a statuary who had worked in the marbles of Italy, to examine these quarries. That gentleman stated, on his return, that marble in large quantities could be had in Washington county, equal, and some of it superior in quality to the most celebrated marble of Italy. Mr. T. had been called upon by a committee of the workmen now engaged on the Treasury building, and from them he had received information leading his mind to the conclusion that marble would cost less than split granite, and no one would deny but that it would be more beautiful to the eye, in a public building, than the sandstone used in the Presidential Mansion and this Capitol. This being the case, he desired to see the building for the Post office department constructed of marble. But he did not propose, in this bill, to make it imperative on the architect to use that material. He desired to avoid debate, and, with that view, proposed to trust the President of the United States in this matter. He could profit by the information which had been and could be collected, and would select the best material, having a due regard to economy.

Mr. LINCOLN, as one of the committee, expressed himself entirely content with the amendment.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved to amend the amendment by striking out, in the second section, all after the words "Be it enacted," and inserting a provision that the principal material of which the exterior walls shall be constructed shall be the same as that of the President's House, Capitol, &c., unless a cheaper and more suitable material can be procured.

After a few words from Mr. McKAY, Mr. TALIAFERRO withdrew his proposition.

Mr. LINCOLN stated some facts in relation to the injury done by absorption in buildings constructed of freestone.

Mr. WISE was opposed to leaving so wide a discretion in the President, and desired that the bill should state specifically the material, length, breadth, cost, &c. He was in favor of spending any amount of money on the Capitol, for that was the people's house. But the public buildings should be merely fire-proof and capacious; he wanted no marble palaces, such as the custom house at New York, to which Mr. W. referred particularly. He desired that the subject should be postponed until next session, when more deliberate action might be had.

Mr. W. here took occasion to inquire from the members of the Committee on the Post Office what records had been lost and what destroyed at the burning of the Post Office, &c., for he understood that the Postmaster General could not or would not furnish those who were sued by the Government with a statement of their accounts.

Mr. CONNOR referred Mr. Wise to the report made by the committee, in their investigation at the time into the circumstances of the fire, and which report contained an account of the books saved.

Mr. WISE expressed his gratification that it was so. All he wished as to the public buildings was, that they should be solid, substantial, and of Republican simplicity.

Mr. LINCOLN urged the necessity of proceeding immediately with the building, and alluded to the constant exposure to which all the records of the Department were hourly exposed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO made a few remarks addressed to the advantage of freestone over granite on the score of economy.

Mr. WISE asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRATT] if there was not reason to believe that there were at present, or had been very recently, the grossest frauds practiced by the disbursing agents of the Government in erecting public buildings here?

Mr. PRATT said something in reply; but not a word reached the ear of the reporter.

Mr. WISE rejoined, that frauds were going on at the rate of seven or eight thousand dollars, instead of seven or eight hundred, in buildings now erecting. He was determined, for his own part, he would not appropriate another dollar until these frauds were examined into. Before he voted money for this building, he must know the dimensions, cost, &c., of the building.

Mr. PRATT said, as one of the Committee on Public Buildings, he had given the subject mature consideration. He had acted in the same manner as if he were acting for himself. He had considered the interests of the Government with the same reference to economy as if the expenditure was to be made out of his own private pocket. It was apparent to all that we needed a post office building, as well to secure the public archives of the country from the dangers of fire, as to subserve the comfort of the Department, and to secure the public interest. The Government is now paying for the building in use more than four thousand dollars as rent. He considered it beneath the dignity of the American people to be driven to the necessity of renting brick, and even combustible, buildings to carry on the operations of the Government, and leave its valuable records to the danger of fire. Prudence, if we have no feeling of pride upon the subject, dictated a different course. But the only difference of opinion seemed to be as to the material of which the building should be constructed. He hoped, for the honor of his country, no more sandstone would be built by the Government. From his experience, and from information furnished, the building could be built of more durable material, say marble or granite, at much less cost than this sandstone, which is of such a nature that, without it be saturated with paint, at an enormous expense, every two or three years, it would crumble into dust. We already see some parts of the Capitol very much impaired by the action of the weather. But the greatest objection is that this sandstone absorbs so much water that the buildings cannot be kept in a fit condition to preserve the public records. Therefore, having a view to public economy, and the durability of this building, I do hope that marble or granite will be adopted. He hoped the appropriation would be made immediately, as we have brought many mechanics here, and thought it the duty of the Government to keep them employed. Some gentleman had called for an estimate. He would furnish the one handed to the committee by the architect:

2,500 perches of foundation stone, (laid,) at $4...	$10,000
4,850,000 bricks, (laid in walls and arches,) at $20...	97,000
9,000 tons of granite, at $5.....	45,000
Working the same, say 80,000 feet, at 30 cents....	24,000
Setting cutstone.....	9,000
Flagging corridors, &c., with stone.....	5,000
Extra work on portico and steps.....	8,000
Cut-stone work inside.....	10,000
Carpenter's work, roof, centering, windows, and doors.....	15,000
Blacksmith's work.....	4,000
Plumber's work, coppering roof, &c.....	9,000
Painters and glaziers, and glass.....	4,500
Plasterers' work.....	10,000
Finishing to sub-basement or cellars.....	2,500
Building privies, inclosing lot, &c.....	6,000
Contingencies, superintendence, &c.....	21,000
Total.....	$380,000

The debate was further continued (about the material for the new Post Office) by Messrs. BANKS, MERCER, and PRATT, when the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a further amendment, limiting the whole expenditure for the Post Office building to $150,000.

Mr. NAYLOR opposed this amendment as precipitate.

Mr. PETRIKIN inquired what was the estimate for the whole expense?

Mr. LINCOLN explained, and concluded by stating that the probable cost would not exceed, in all, $250,000.

Mr. PETRIKIN thereupon modified his amendment, so as to fix that sum as a maximum.

After a remonstrance by Messrs. CAMBRELENG, and JOHNSON of Maryland, against further delay,

The question was taken; and the amendment rejected.

After further conversation between Messrs. WISE and PRATT,

Mr. RENCHER moved an amendment providing that no more than one architect should be employed.

The count being made on its adoption, the committee was found to be without a quorum.

After various motions, the committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

A call of the House was moved, and negatived—yeas 53, nays 80; when,

A quorum being present, Mr. INGHAM resumed the chair of the Committee of the Whole,

And the amendment of Mr. RENCHER was adopted.

FRONTIER MILITARY WORKS.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the committee took up a bill for the erection of military works on our northeastern frontier, (it appropriates to that object $100,000.)

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, inquired what was meant by the phrase "military works" in the bill?

Mr. McKAY, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, explained the grounds of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON then went at length into a speech in favor of the erection of a United States armory for the founding of cannon, in which he dwelt with great earnestness on the unprovided state of our fortifications, and urged the necessity of measures to arm them, as well on the sea-board as on our inland frontiers. He quoted the report of the Ordnance Bureau, from which it appeared that one thousand one hundred and seventy-eight guns were needed to man new forts already erected, two thousand five hundred and seventy-eight for works in process of construction, seven hundred and eighty-two for forts now rebuilding, three thousand six hundred and six for other works, projected but not yet commenced; making in all thirteen thousand three hundred and twenty pieces of ordnance, exclusive of what were needed for the Navy.

He then stated the guns now on hand, which were one thousand heavy cannon and mortars, not much more than half of which were fit for use; nine hundred and thirty-five in forts, one thousand two hundred and nineteen in depot, one hundred and fifty under contract to be cast; making in all two thousand three hundred and four; thus leaving a deficit of eleven thousand and seventeen pieces, aside from the Navy and field trains.

He stated the condition of the guns now mounted in our forts, the want of new mortars similar to those used by the French in the late siege and demolition of the castle of St. Juan d'Ulloa, in Mexico, and the introduction of similar mortars into the British service. He then quoted the recommendations of an armory by various Presidents, and urged the measure with much zeal.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved for the rising of the committee; which motion prevailing, the committee thereupon rose, and reported the bills which had been acted upon to the House; which, at about half past eleven, thereupon adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1839.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, in relation to the mode of furnishing supplies for the Indian Department; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, relative to the number and description of persons employed as agents by the Indian Office; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 21st instant; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the operations of the branch mints; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the register and receiver at St. Stephens, Alabama; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi, on the subject of certain mail routes; which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the documents relating to the claim of Henry Funkhouser, and the memorial of the Stockbridge Indians, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Job Whipple, and the petition of the heirs of Thomas West, severally asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Gibert B. Stalker and N. B. Hill, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred various memorials from officers of the line of the Army, praying equalization of pay with the officers of the staff, made a report thereon, that the request of the petitioners was reasonable and ought to be granted, but that the present was not a favorable time to accomplish the object; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of a number of half-breeds of the Sac and Fox Indians, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. S., from the same committee, to which was referred an act for the relief of the Brotherton Indians, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the President's message, and accompanying documents, in relation to the existing difficulties on the north-eastern frontier, made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the messages of the President of the United States of the 26th and the 27th instant, and the accompanying documents, in relation to the existing difficulties on the north-eastern frontier of the United States, report the following resolutions, and recommend their adoption by the Senate:

Resolved, That the Senate can discover no trace, throughout the long correspondence which has been submitted to them, between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, of any understanding, express or implied, much less of any "explicit agreement," such as is now alleged, that the territory in dispute between them on the northeastern boundary of the latter, shall be placed and remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of her Britannic Majesty's Government until the settlement of the question; on the contrary, it appears that there was, and is, a clear subsisting understanding between the parties, under which they have both acted, that, until this question shall be finally determined, each of them shall refrain from the exercise of jurisdiction over any portion of the disputed territory, except such parts of it as may have been in the actual possession of the one or the other party.

Resolved, That whilst the United States are bound, in good faith, to comply with this understanding, during the pendency of negotiations, the Senate cannot perceive that the State of Maine has violated the spirit of it by merely sending, under the authority of the Legislature, her land agent, with a sufficient force, into the disputed territory, for the sole purpose of expelling lawless trespassers engaged in impairing its value by cutting down the timber; both parties having a common right, and being bound by a common duty, to expel such intruders from a territory to which each claims title, taking care, however, to retire within their acknowledged limits when this single object has been accomplished.

Resolved, That should her Britannic Majesty's Government, in violation of the clear understanding between the parties, persist in carrying its avowed determination into execution, and attempt, by military force, to assume exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, all of which, they firmly believe, rightfully belong to the State of Maine, the exigency, in the opinion of the Senate, will then have occurred, rendering it the imperative duty of the President, under the Constitution and the laws, to call forth the militia, and employ the military force of the United States, for the purpose of repelling such an invasion. And in this event, the Senate will cordially cooperate with and sustain the President in defending the rights of the country.

Resolved, That should the British authorities refrain from attempting a military occupation of the territory in dispute, and from enforcing their claim to exclusive jurisdiction over it by arms, that then, in the opinion of the Senate, the State of Maine ought, on her part, to pursue a course of similar forbearance. And should she refuse to do so, and determine to settle the controversy for herself by force, the adjustment of which is intrusted, under the Constitution, to the Federal Government, in such an event there will be no obligation imposed on that Government to sustain her by military aid.

The report was ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution for the distribution of the Madison papers; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred an act granting to the Territory of Iowa a quantity of land for the erection of public buildings, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution for the relief of Edward Beatty, reported the same without amendment.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted a resolution for the distribution of certain books; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to the Senate, at the commencement of the session in December next, or as soon thereafter as may be, what measures have been taken since the last report of Messrs. Crawford and Balch, in settling the claims of the purchasers of reservations growing out of the treaty of 1832, and particularly what further action has been had, or may before that time yet be had, on the contract of J. C. Watson & Co., as conditionally ratified by the late President of the United States, and upon the assents of the individual reserves to that contract, purporting to have been taken by Captain John Page, what charges have been made impeaching those assents, together with the evidence filed thereon. Also, copies of all correspondence on the subject of referring said contract to the examination of a commissioner or commissioners, with the instructions given to said commissioner, and his decision thereon, as to the legality of said contract under the treaty, and the validity of the assents so taken, particularly whether any assents purporting to be signed by the original reserves, and that he furnish a list of the reserves whose lands are included in the Watson contracts, and who are marked on the register of the certifying agents as being dead; and also a list of those Indians entitled to reservations who died or were killed in the Florida war, and of those who died on the route from Alabama to their destination west of the Mississippi, as appears from the report of the officers in charge of the different emigrating parties.

Resolved, further, That the Secretary of War be instructed to issue no patent in confirmation of the Watson contract, nor to make any final decision adverse to private claimants, and in favor of said contract, until the report required in the preceding resolution shall be submitted to the examination of the Senate.

TREASURY NOTES.

The bill to revive and continue in force the act providing for the issue of Treasury notes, came up on its third reading.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to make an inquiry of Mr. WRIGHT, whether there was any intention of selling the remaining bond due by the Bank of the United States; and gave it, unhesitatingly, as his opinion that the sale of the second bond was not only perfectly legal, but a judicious proceeding. He thought, moreover, that the manner in which the funds had been dispersed had a considerable agency in the resumption of specie payments.

The bill was passed without a division.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate took up the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year 1839.

After some amendments had been made, Mr. WEBSTER offered an amendment appropriating the sum of $272,000 in payment for the services of the Massachusetts militia during the last war with Great Britain.

After a short discussion, in which Messrs. WRIGHT, WEBSTER, and DAVIS took part, the amendment was rejected—yeas 17, nays 18.

After the adoption of several other amendments, the bill was reported to the Senate, and

Mr. DAVIS renewed the motion of Mr. WEBSTER, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Rugless, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, and Williams of Maine—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read the third time and passed:

- Resolution for the relief of the heirs of Captain Frederick M. Bell, deceased;

Resolution for the relief of the heirs of Charles Brown, deceased.

An act for the relief of Archibald S. Hunter;

An act for the relief of the Louisville Savings Institution;

An act for the relief of the Springfield Manufacturing Company;

An act authorizing a grant of bounty land to the heirs of Bennet Shurley;

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles S. Walsh;

An act for the relief of John H. Pease;

An act for the relief of Frederick Frey & Co.;

An act to authorize the issuing of a register to

Anthony C. Meneghetti, for the sloop Sarah;

An act for the relief of John Randolph Clay;

An act for the relief of John Whitsitt;

An act for the relief of Robert Murray;

An act for the relief of Jonathan Boone;

Resolution for the relief of Abraham Wright;

An act for the relief of James Madison;

An act for the relief of Samuel Dickerson;

An act for the relief of Nathaniel H. Hooe;

An act for the relief of John Wiley and Jefferson Greer;

An act for the relief of Messrs. Smith and Towne;

An act for the relief of Levi Chadwick;

An act for the relief of Daniel Malone;

An act for the relief of Tilford Taylor;

An act for the relief of William W. Stevenson and Joseph Henderson;

An act for the relief of John Davlin;

An act for the relief of Hiner Stigermire;

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Nathan Sage;

An act for the relief of Nathaniel Mitchell;

An act for the relief of William Colt and William Donaldson;

An act for the relief of John E. Alexander;

An act for the relief of Thomas McClelland and James Smith;

An act for the relief of Jesse E. Dow;

An act for the relief of certain heirs and legal representatives of James Wilson; and

An act for the relief of Thomas T. Triplett.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 28, 1839.

The first business in order was the motion to print the report and documents brought in by the select committee appointed to inquire into the character, &c., of Virginia bounty warrants.

The pending question was on the motion to print.

Mr. BRIGGS, with a view of saving time, requested the gentleman who objected to the printing of the report, to allow it to be printed, with the replicatory papers, viz: a report of the Virginia Legislature, and of the marshal of the State.

Mr. MALLORY said he would make no bargain.

Mr. BRIGGS then gave a brief account of the proceedings of the committee, and their labors, and moved the printing of five thousand extra copies.

Mr. MALLORY opposed the printing, and made some complaints of the course of the committee.

Mr. WISE called for the reading of the report, which was ordered; and its reading, without being concluded, occupied the whole of the remaining part of the morning hour.

Mr. THOMAS, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to settle and certify the accounts of the members of the committee appointed to investigate the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout and others, on the same principles as those of the committee which investigated the affairs of the late Bank of the United States.

The resolution was read, and agreed to without a division.

Mr. S. W. MORRIS had risen in the mean while and addressed the Chair; but was not heard. Mr. M. then requested some gentleman to move for a reconsideration, as an act of justice to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. DE GRAFF accordingly made that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, said the committee had investigated this matter, and had come to the conclusion that these allowances ought not to be made. He hoped the question would at least be postponed till to-morrow, as the resolution had taken him by surprise; for Mr. J. was satisfied he could convince the House they ought not to pass it.

The House refused to reconsider—ayes 56, noes 67.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

NORTHERN FRONTIER.

The bill making an appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier coming up on its third reading.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to strike out the words "or volunteers," as the act authorizing the employment of that force by the President had expired.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested whether that description of force might not become indispensable, and the President might be authorized, by the retention of those words, to call them out.

Mr. McKAY desired the adoption of the amendment for that reason.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, however, withdrew the amendment, and the bill was passed.

FLORIDA WAR.

The bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for 1839 then came up on its third reading.

Mr. BELL renewed the following amendment, moved by him in committee:

For paying the value of the horses and equipage of the Tennessee and other volunteers who have at any time been in the service of the United States, in the Territory of Florida, and which were turned over to the Government by the order of the commanding general, or other commanding officer, said value to be ascertained by the appraisement of said value when the volunteers entered the service, $52,000.

And the provisions of acts approved and in force at various periods since 1813, authorizing payment for horses lost in the service of the United States by rangers, militia, and volunteers, are hereby revived and extended for two years, from and after the passage of this act, and, under the action of the Third Auditor shall be deemed to embrace all cases not already satisfied, of horses lost to their owners in service as aforesaid, in battle or otherwise, where due care and diligence be rendered manifest on the part of the owner; and whether, if the death or loss of rangers' horses shall have occurred for want of forage, and at places when acting in obedience to the orders of commanding officers, forage could not have been procured by proper diligence on the part of the owner.

Mr. RUSSELL renewed his amendment to the amendment of Mr. BELL, by adding thereto the following:

"No payment, however, shall be made for horses or other property lost or destroyed, when the loss or destruction shall have been occasioned by the fault or neglect of the owner, or when, by the terms of the contract, the risk was upon the owner of the property. And the valuation, when horses have been turned over to the Government, shall be made at the time they were turned over."

Mr. TURNEY warmly opposed the proposition of Mr. R. and supported the original amendment.

After some further remarks from Messrs. THOMPSON and DOWNING,

Mr. BELL accepted the first branch of the amendment as a modification; but the second, he said, would have the effect of defeating the whole.

After a few further remarks from Mr. CHAMBERS; the last branch of Mr. RUSSELL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRENNELL opposed the amendment of Mr. BELL, and entreated the House to put it off till next session, and not, thus in the dark, vote so large a draft upon the Treasury without having the facts or any investigation.

Mr. RUSSELL demanded the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the amendment was agreed to—ayes 81, noes 61.

Mr. GRANTLAND renewed the amendment submitted by him in Committee of the Whole last night:

For refunding to the State of Georgia, for pay and subsistence of the troops called into service by that State to drive the Indians from the Okefenokee swamp, $35,323.

After a few remarks in opposition to it by Mr. MASON, of Ohio,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the previous question on the bill.

Mr. OWENS begged the gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. PETRIKIN refused.

The previous question was then put and carried.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked leave to submit a resolution to rescind the 16th joint rule of the two Houses, which provides that no bill can be sent from one branch to the other for concurrence, within the last three days of the session, be suspended, so far as regards the above two bills.

Objection being made,

Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules, which was agreed to; and the resolution being before the House,

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved to include the bill to provide for taking the sixth census.

Mr. CAMBRELENG accepted this as a modification.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to strike out all limitation.

Mr. PICKENS protested against the adoption of this amendment; for those who had the physical force would then pass what bills they pleased.

Mr. SHIELDS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

Mr. HOWARD, on leave, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill giving to the President of the United States additional powers for the defense of the United States, in certain cases, against invasion, and for other purposes; which was read twice.

The bill was accompanied by a report, which, upon the call of Mr. LEGARÉ, was read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which have been referred two messages from the President of the United States, inclosing sundry papers relating to the disturbances upon the Aroostook river, in the State of Maine, report:

That they have examined the papers submitted to them by the House with great care, and will offer such reflections upon them as the limited time for the preparation of this report will admit. The very near approach of the termination of the present Congress, and the desire of the committee that as much time as possible should be afforded to the House for the examination of the bill herewith reported, are considerations of such a powerful nature that some incidental matters connected with the subject cannot be fully investigated. The main points, however, of the controversy, are not numerous, and upon them the opinion of the committee is clear and decided. The position assumed by the President in his message is correct, and ought to be sustained, if necessary, by the legislative power of Congress.

It is well known that an informal arrangement or understanding has existed, for many years past, between the United States and Great Britain, relating to the territory in dispute between them, and having for its object the avoidance of clashing authorities, calculated to endanger the peace of the two nations. The committee have not time to give a detailed and historical statement of the origin and progress of this arrangement, the examination of which might perhaps elucidate the cause of the strange error into which the British Government is represented by its agents in this country to have fallen with respect to its provisions. Suffice it to say, that it never appears to have gone further, in its greatest extent, than to adopt the basis of the "uti possidetis," leaving each party to the continued exercise of the jurisdiction which it had previously maintained in practice. The idea which is occasionally suggested in some of the British documents, that, prior to the peace of 1763, the Government of Great Britain was in possession of the whole country, and, therefore, that this constructive possession must be considered as continuing until she is divested of it with her own consent, is one which the United States can never sanction, or even listen to, without strong repugnance. It implies that the people of the United States hold their country by a grant from the British Crown, made in the treaty of 1763—a doctrine which was successfully resisted by the Ministers of the United States, even when it was advanced by remote implication, prior to the signature of that treaty, by their refusing to treat with the British ministers until their credentials were changed. At a subsequent period of our history, the same doctrine was advanced in argument, and at that period, also, was, as it must ever be, met with instant contradiction. The people of the United States hold their country by virtue of the declaration of the 4th July, 1776; and the treaty of 1763 did nothing more than arrange the boundary lines between the two nations, independent of each other in fact and in right. So far, therefore, as the claim of Great Britain to the jurisdiction over the unsettled parts of Maine is founded upon the twice exploded theory that she is the rightful sovereign of all that she has not granted away, it cannot be submitted to without sacrifices of honor, which the American nation never will make.

When the discussion became active between the two Governments, as to their respective rights to the territory now in dispute, the greater part of it was, and indeed still remains, uninhabited by permanent settlers. Here and there a small settlement could be found, consisting in some cases of a single house, and in others of more than one, placed near each other for the convenience of the inhabitants. The extent of the arrangement between the two Governments does not appear, as construed by the American Government, to have gone further than the recognition of the jurisdiction of each over the people and lands then operated upon by it. If these inhabitants had taken out the titles to their lands from either one Government or the other, and were in the habit of resorting to its judicial authority for the preservation of order, then they were to continue so to do until the question of ultimate ownership should be finally decided in some mode satisfactory to both Governments. The propriety of this arrangement will not be questioned by the committee. If it left to the British Government the jurisdiction over the inhabitants along the military road which leads from Halifax to Quebec, and thereby furnished it with a motive for procrastinating the controversy; inasmuch as it continued in the enjoyment of nearly all that rendered the country valuable as a British possession, it also furnished a strong proof of the desire of the American Government to deal fairly and liberally with its antagonist in the argument. Demonstrating in this conclusive manner that it was not influenced by a capacious spirit of discontent, the Government of the United States derived from this state of the case a right to appeal to the British Government to expedite the final adjustment of the controversy, and to claim, in the meantime, the full benefit on its part of an arrangement which, perhaps, gave to its adversary more than an equal share of advantages.

But the arrangement has been entirely misunderstood or misconstrued, if the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick be correct in his exposition of the orders under which he is acting. The United States never did, and never can, consent that the exclusive jurisdiction of the whole territory in dispute shall be consigned to the care of any officer of the British Government. The pretension now advanced is as unreasonable in itself as it is unsustained by any agreement between the two Governments. Supposing that the parties to the controversy stand upon an equal footing as to their rights, (and there is none other in the case, except the inadmissible one formerly alluded to,) the United States have as much reason to expect that Great Britain will yield to them the exclusive jurisdiction of the whole of the contested territory, together with the care and custody of the timber and other public property, as she has to require from us such an extravagant concession. On the part of the United States, it has never been claimed, or asked, as far as the committee are informed; and the true position of the President now is, that he resists the application of a principle, which no Executive of this country ever adopted as his guide. It has not been asked of Great Britain, nor can it be submitted to from her. What the United States ask from others, they are always willing to grant; nor can they grant what it would be deemed unreasonable to ask.

That portion of the territory in which the recent and present disturbances exist, has been, for a number of years past, subject to the laws of Maine; and, before the separation of Maine from Massachusetts, was under the control of the latter. In December, 1807, Massachusetts conveyed one township, lying on both sides of the Aroostook, and near the meridian line from the source of the St. Croix, according to a selection, survey, and plan made under a resolve passed in March, 1806. In January, 1808, she conveyed ten thousand acres, lying west of the aforesaid township, and on both sides of the Aroostook, pursuant to a survey and plan made under the same resolve. This jurisdiction has been continued, through the medium of land agents, ever since that time; and the settlers, who have been there for a number of years past, (certainly since 1823,) have always, in practice, held their property under grants from Massachusetts and Maine. The part remaining unsettled has been applied to no other useful purpose than to use the timber, in which it is very productive; and the State of Massachusetts has been in the practice of granting licenses to her people to cut timber from the public domain. The exercise of jurisdiction was as perfect as the nature of the country would permit. The mere fact of granting licenses to cut timber to certain individuals shows that the preservation of the timber was held to be an object of great consequence, and drew after it the incidental right of refusing to permit the timber to be cut down, whenever it was thought wise to do so; or of taking other measures for its preservation, by driving off trespassers, or punishing them by civil process. This right Maine derived from Massachusetts. Every State government in the Union has a right to regulate the landed interest, whether public or private, within its limits; and Maine stands upon the same footing, unless as to such parts of it as are decided not to be under its jurisdiction by the exercise of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government. But, as has been already observed, no proceeding or agreement of the Federal Government can be found which did not recognize an actual jurisdiction, just such as that now claimed and enforced by Maine. Whether the Legislature of that State ought or ought not, in courtesy to the Federal Government, to have invoked its interposition before driving off the trespassers with a strong hand, is a question which the committee deem it unnecessary to examine; because the pretensions advanced by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick equally exclude the right of the United States and Maine to interfere. If the United States had been applied to, and the urgency of the case had rendered a prompt and forcible interposition necessary to remove those lawless trespassers who were equally the enemies of both Governments, the same opposition would have been made to such interference by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, and the same question arisen as in the present case.

The conflicting claims of Great Britain and the United States are now presented in antagonistical position to each other, and the subordinate question as to the manner in which they have thus been brought in direct opposition is not of sufficient importance to require a strict examination. If it were, it might be argued that the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in directing a boom to be placed across the mouth of the Aroostook river, for the purpose of intercepting, seizing, and selling, the timber which has been cut, is no sufficient satisfaction to the State of Maine, which may desire to preserve its own timber, whilst it argues such remissness on the part of the British authorities over their own people as might well have induced the State of Maine to enforce her own laws. If the committee are right in the view which they have taken of the arrangement between the United States and Great Britain, there is nothing in it to impair, but, on the contrary, everything to ratify, the jurisdiction of Maine over that part of her territory where it had long been familiar; and the interference of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick is a violation of the existing understanding. In the first proceeding of Maine, the force sent to arrest or drive off the numerous and armed bands of trespassers who were depredating upon the public property, appears to have been in the nature of a civil process, in execution of the law of the land. The power of a ministerial officer, (such as a sheriff, for example,) to compel obedience to the law, and to summon to his aid a sufficient portion of the "power of the country" to subdue opposition, is well known both to American and British jurisprudence, and is sanctioned by early laws in the history of England. The riotous and desperate character of the marauders upon the Aroostook is sufficiently manifested by the fact of their breaking open an arsenal upon the British territory, in order to supply themselves with an additional quantity of arms to enable them to resist and repel the party which was approaching, under a civil officer, to require submission to the laws.

The proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick was issued before any steps were taken by Maine to sustain the civil by the military power, and was directed against the interference of the ministerial officer of the law, acting in strict conformity with what are believed to be fundamental principles of British as well as American law. The first appeal to military force was made by him, and the subsequent proceedings of Maine are defensive merely. The pretension of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick excludes the civil as well as the military power of Maine and the United States from interfering to preserve order in this seat of the ancient jurisdiction of Massachusetts; and would compel the United States and Maine to rely upon the justice, the vigilance, or the generosity of the British authorities for the maintenance of good order and the enforcement of the laws, in a country where nothing but a naked claim can be said to exist upon the part of the British Government. It demands of Maine that she should divest herself of a jurisdiction practically established and ascertained, and transfer it to Great Britain. It demands of the United States that an arrangement, alleged to have been made between the two Governments, of the existence of which the United States are unconscious, should be summarily carried out, according to the construction which one of the parties is said to have placed upon it, and without giving to the other party an opportunity to contest such construction. It is difficult, in the opinion of the committee, to believe that the Government of Great Britain maintains such an interpretation of the arrangement, and thus converts what was intended for the preservation of friendly feelings into a source of great and instant discord. But the assertion of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick has been twice officially, deliberately, and publicly made, that he is acting under the instructions of his Government; a fact of which he and his Government can be the only judges. The execution of these orders is incompatible with the honor of the United States. The executive branch of the Government has expressed this opinion, and in this opinion the committee fully concur. The sudden execution of these orders may bring on a crisis for which as much preparation ought to be made as the short time remaining of the present session of Congress will permit; and the bill which is herewith submitted is intended to accomplish that purpose.

The committee refer with much pleasure to the efforts which have been made by the British Minister at Washington, evidenced by the memorandum of a conference between him and the Secretary of State, to avert the events which seem to be approaching. If the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick shall desist from any attempt to take or hold military possession of the whole of the disputed territory, it will be easy to restore things to their former condition. If he shall determine to suspend further movements until the decision of the British Government be known, it will be for that Government to say what shall be the political relations between the United States and Great Britain; whether the friendship which now so happily prevails between the two nations, for the preservation of which the essential interests of both loudly call, shall be suddenly and rudely broken by assuming a principle as a ground of action to which the United States cannot submit.

The committee cannot but entertain the hope that no precipitate counsels on the part of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick will deprive the Government of Great Britain of an opportunity of explaining, before any more serious difficulties shall have occurred, orders which he is believed to have misunderstood. In this event, all immediate difficulties will disappear. The insuperable objection to the military occupation of the disputed territory by Great Britain requires, in common fairness, that no attempt of the kind should be made by Maine or the United States. Having accomplished her intention of driving off or arresting the trespassers upon the Aroostook, and thus enforcing her laws, Maine will, it is not to be doubted, be satisfied with this vindication of her sovereignty, and withdraw the military force which is now in arms to sustain the civil authority and repel invasion. A contemporaneous cessation of measures by Maine and New Brunswick will compromise the honor of neither; and time will thus be afforded for the British Government to select the position which it intends to occupy in the relations between it and the United States. If any motive were necessary to induce Maine to adopt a course so manifestly proper, it would be found in the prompt response of the Executive of the United States to the appeal made to it at the present crisis, and the jealous sensibility which has been manifested for the protection of her rights, by spreading over them the ample powers of the Federal Union.

The committee ought, perhaps, here to close this report.

But the anxiety which they feel that no measure should be left unemployed to preserve the peace between the United States and Great Britain, by removing, not only temporarily but permanently, the causes of discontent between them, induces them to offer another recommendation to the House. It is, the expression of an opinion by the House, sustained by a legislative provision, that a special embassy should be sent to England, for the purpose of cooperating with the resident Minister there, in endeavoring to adjust this long-pending controversy. The precedents for this measure in our history are numerous and encouraging.

The object of such an embassy is, to express a deep conviction on the part of the Government of the extreme urgency of the case, and the absolute necessity of adjusting existing difficulties. The ordinary forms of negotiation appear insufficient to rouse the British Government to the danger that the two nations may find themselves involved in war, notwithstanding the desire of the Governments of both to avoid it; and the step proposed would manifest to the world, at all events, that the United States are sincerely anxious to exert every means in their power to maintain the most amicable relations with a Government and people, so eminently entitled to the respect and regard of every civilized nation on the globe.

The committee are conscious that some of the provisions of the bill herewith reported would more properly have emanated from some of the other committees of the House, upon whose jurisdiction they are reluctant to encroach; but the few days which remain of this session would not have permitted any delay, with a view of referring these subjects to other committees, with the slightest hope of obtaining any action on the part of the House. They submit the whole matter, therefore, as the result of their anxious reflections, to the better judgment of the House.

The following bill was also reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

A bill giving to the President of the United States additional powers for the defense of the United States, in certain cases, against invasion, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to resist any attempt on the part of Great Britain to enforce, by arms, her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over that part of the State of Maine which is in dispute between the United States and Great Britain; and, for that purpose, to employ the naval and military forces of the United States and such portions of the militia as he may deem it advisable to call into service.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign Power, or of imminent danger of such invasion discovered, in his opinion, to exist, before Congress can be convened to act upon the subject, the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, in addition to the present military establishment of the United States, to raise a provisional force, to be enlisted for five years, or during the continuance of hostilities with any foreign Power, not exceeding one regiment of dragoons, one regiment of artillery, two regiments of riflemen, and sixteen regiments of infantry, to be organized, in all respects, like the corresponding regiments now in service; and, also, to appoint not exceeding one major general, four brigadiers general, and not exceeding one surgeon and one assistant surgeon for each new regiment; the regimental general, and medical officers to be subject to the same laws and rules, and to be entitled to the same benefits, of every kind, with the like corps and officers now in service; and it shall be the duty of the President to discharge the troops which may be raised by virtue of this act, whenever the occasion for them, as defined by this act, shall cease to exist.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of either of the contingencies provided in the first section of this act, the President of the United States shall be authorized to complete the public armed vessels now authorized by law, and to equip, man, and employ in actual service all the naval force of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of ——— millions of dollars is hereby appropriated and placed at his disposal for the purpose of executing the provisions of this act, to provide for which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to cause to be issued certificates of stock signed by the Register of the Treasury for the sum to be borrowed or any part thereof; and the same to be sold upon the best terms that may be offered, after public notice for proposals for the same: Provided, That no engagement or contract shall be entered into, which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed, after the expiration of five years from the 1st of January next; and that the rate of interest shall not exceed five per cent., payable semi-annually.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $18,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for outfit and salary of a special Minister to Great Britain: Provided, The President of the United States shall deem it expedient to appoint the same.

Mr. HOWARD said, in view of the condition of the public business, and the little time left them, he hoped, at present, anything like a general debate would be abstained from. His object was to have the bill referred to a Committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and make it the special order for to-morrow at ten o'clock.

Mr. ADAMS asked the committee to agree to a small amendment in the report. The report affirmed that the British Government had taken the ground of an agreement that they should hold exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory. Now, he did not understand that the British Government had taken that ground. The provincial governor had undoubtedly taken that ground, and rested his defense upon it. If, therefore, in the course of the negotiation upon this subject, there was found clear and demonstrated proof that no such agreement ever has been passed, which he was well assured of, then the Governor of New Brunswick had put himself, and, as far as possible, the Government of his country in the wrong from the very first moment.

Mr. EVANS interposed. He said it was true that Sir John Harvey asserts the existence of that agreement as the basis upon which he proceeds but then he adds that he acts by the express commands of his Government, and that he holds positive orders from which he is not at liberty to depart.

Mr. ADAMS so understood it; but that order from his Government was founded upon his own construction of what those orders were. Now, the reason why he wished this alteration made was this: the Governor of New Brunswick had assumed that ground for his Government. Mr. A. said he had assumed it on his own responsibility. The Governor affirmed that he had such orders, and that it was upon them that he acted. Now, Mr. A. inferred, and was willing to leave it to the British Government, and he was convinced such would ultimately be its declaration, that Sir John Harvey had misunderstood his orders; and it will say, "We do not assume, and have not assumed, that principle." If, when these matters come before the British Government, they should find a report of this House, (on which was based the action of this House,) assuming that that Government has taken the ground which their subordinate officer affirms they have taken, then they will so far redeem that ground of right as to say to us, "Your proceedings have been too precipitate; you have assumed that what our subordinate officer did, under his own construction of his orders, was our act." Now, the first and most important thing in any controversy has in this case been assumed by the Governor of New Brunswick, in putting his own country in the wrong. Sir, I want to keep them there; I want to give his Government an opportunity to say, "This gentleman, acting with the best intentions, and with an ardent zeal in my service, which I approve, has mistaken the import of the orders I gave." If you assume to make the British Government responsible beforehand for an assertion which an inferior officer alone has made, but for which his Government is not yet responsible, then I say you weaken the ground of right, to maintain which this nation should go to death and destruction. I repeat, that from the moment this correspondence appeared, and from the moment that the Governor of New Brunswick assumed this alleged agreement as a justification for his orders and conduct, as he construes his orders, I have considered the case of the United States as triumphant in advance; it has the right; and, without quoting exactly what was said on another occasion by one of the greatest observers of the affairs of mankind,

"Thrice is he arm'd that hath his quarrel just,"

I will say thrice three times is he armed who hath his quarrel just. The Governor of New Brunswick, by the position which he has assumed, has, in fact, conceded the whole cause of quarrel between the two nations. It will turn out, it must turn out, that the British Government can bring no proof of such an agreement; and they, having no such proof to allege in the face of the world, will say, "Our officer misunderstood our instructions; we never assumed the principle; we disavow it; and we are prepared to settle this quarrel on the grounds of right and justice."

All I wish to suggest to the committee and to the House is, that a small alteration should be made, that a word or two in the passages in which it is affirmed that the British Government has assumed this principle should be effaced, so as not to make the British Government responsible for the construction put upon their orders, and to give them an opportunity to disavow the construction which their officer has set up.

Mr. LEGARE said he concurred in the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and the more so because he (Mr. L.) had the honor to urge the same views strenuously in the committee this morning. It was not from mere oversight that these words had been inserted. His opinion had been that the committee should take pains to separate the military officer of New Brunswick from the Government of Great Britain. He had said in committee, and he had repeated here, that he did not think the British Government ever thought of giving such orders. He regarded it as impossible, looking to the circumstances in which Canada was placed, that the Government of Great Britain could, in this sudden, violent, and, he would add, insolent manner, undertake to disturb our peace; but (Mr. L. was understood to add) the committee were of opinion that this idea was not involved.

Mr. HOWARD quoted the language of the particular passages of the report referred to by Mr. ADAMS, (the precise words of which the reporter is unable to give, not having the document before him.) Mr. H. was desirous to make any amendment to the report which might be considered proper. We have not before us (said he) the orders of the Governor of New Brunswick. He is a very high officer, and intrusted with very great power. The whole power of the British forces throughout the Canadas is understood to be placed at his disposal. He is therefore an officer whom we should presume to be high in the confidence of his Government; and, when we found him re-asserting the same principle with which he had set out, we came to the conclusion that he had intelligence enough to understand his own orders, and that we were justified in supposing that such were his orders, having no reason to judge otherwise.

Mr. H. then alluded to the language of the letter of Mr. Fox, in reference to the claim to exclusive jurisdiction, as being a sufficient indication of the interpretation put upon this matter by the British Government; which language, added to the declaration of this high functionary, the Governor of New Brunswick, was the ground on which the committee had proceeded.

Mr. H. would cheerfully agree, so far as he was concerned, to any alteration which could properly be made on the suggestions of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because he (Mr. H.) felt assured that on the leading features of the controversy they both thought alike. He was glad of that gentleman's support in any cause, especially in such a cause as this. The report was now in possession of the House; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would take it and suggest any modification which might seem proper to him, he (Mr. H.) would, for his own part, cheerfully accept them, provided they did not affect the essential parts of the report.

Mr. ADAMS said he had not the slightest objection to any part of the report, except the few words to which he had alluded, (and which he specifically pointed out.) He reiterated his wish that the British Government should be left at liberty to disavow the act of the Governor of New Brunswick, and to say that he misunderstood his orders. Such Mr. A. believed to be the fact. He believed, and there were undoubted evidences, that not only the Governor of New Brunswick, but the British Minister here, (the conduct of which latter gentleman, in taking upon himself a great responsibility to prevent impending extremities, Mr. A. regarded as of the most high and honorable character,) had the impression fixed in the strongest manner upon his mind that such an agreement existed. (In proof of this position Mr. A. alluded to the language quoted by Mr. HOWARD from Mr. Fox's letter.) And yet, when the existence of such an agreement was denied, as it ought to be, in the most positive and explicit terms, by the Secretary of State, the British Minister, instead of producing evidence of that agreement, said he would refer it to his Government. If there was such an agreement, was it not in the power of the Provincial Governor or the British Minister here to have produced it? And if it had been produced, we must undoubtedly have changed our ground. But from that very fact, Mr. A. believed that both the Minister and the Governor had misunderstood the matter, and had imputed to their Government that which never was intended, and he wished that, in every proceeding here, this House should do the British Government the justice to suppose that their officers, both military and diplomatic, had misunderstood their views on this subject, and that the Government would at once disavow what had been imputed to them.

Mr. EVANS suggested, as an easy mode of making any alterations that might be advisable, that the report should be printed under the superintendence of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD accepted the suggestion, and modified his motion accordingly.

And thereupon the bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, were made the special order of the day for to-morrow, (Friday,) at eleven o'clock, to take precedence over all other business, and were ordered to be printed under the superintendence of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved the printing of twenty thousand extra copies of the President's message, bill, report, documents, &c.

Mr. BRONSON had no objection to the printing of any reasonable number, if it could be done in reasonable time; but he understood they could not be furnished till some time in October or November next.

Mr. LOOMIS said that by any time they could be furnished they would be stale, and he would move ten thousand.

Mr. JOHNSON thought they would be printed in a few days; but he accepted the amendment, and, as modified, the motion was agreed to.

DEFENSE OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. BRONSON moved that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order to consider the three following bills:

House bill (No. 1097) making appropriations for the defense of the northern and western frontier;

House bill (No. 1169) for the erection of certain military works on the northeast frontier of the United States; and House bill (No. 1032) to provide for the establishment of a national foundry.

Mr. B., in support of the motion, said that, at the present moment, the foregoing bills, relating exclusively to the defense of the country, were of the utmost importance, and he hoped the House would agree to consider them.

The motion was disagreed to.

CENSUS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then again went into committee, (Mr. SERGEANT in the chair,) and

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, the committee took up the bill pending for the taking of the next census.

The bill having been read,

Mr. G. moved two additional sections; which were agreed to.

Various amendments were offered, and some progress had been made in the bill, when, the hour of three having arrived,

The House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. THOMAS having moved a resolution for the compensation of the investigating committee in a manner corresponding to preceding practice on that subject; which was agreed to—

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee of Accounts, made a statement in exculpation of that committee for having refused to allow a certain account presented to them by the chairman of the investigating committee. The account amounted to $2,726, for thirteen days' services in New York.

The committee then returned to the consideration of the

CENSUS BILL.

Mr. LOOMIS moved an amendment, proposing to add certain items to the returns of the marshals relating to the ages of unmarried persons. It excited no little merriment in the committee, and was rejected.

Mr. WISE made explanations in reply to those of Mr. MORRIS, and in defense of the investigating committee.

Mr. McKAY moved to amend the bill by substituting the 1st of June for the 1st of January, as the period for commencing the census. He advocated the amendment at some length.

It was opposed by Mr. GARLAND, and advocated by Mr. TILLINGHAST, and negatived.

Mr. SLADE moved an amendment proposing a minute classification of the colored population as to age, &c.; but it was rejected without a count.

Mr. ADAMS insisted that the time heretofore fixed for taking the census was too short, and suggested to Mr. GARLAND to strike out six months and insert twelve.

Mr. GARLAND assented to the grounds of Mr. ADAMS's objection, and moved to insert ten months; which was agreed to.

Mr. G. proposed to increase the compensation of marshals employed in taking the census to $2 per hundred names.

Mr. DAVIES proposed $1 50; but it was negatived, and the amendment of Mr. GARLAND was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND then moved to fill the blanks in the compensation to marshals in the manner following:

In Maine, $400; Massachusetts, $450; Rhode Island, $250; Vermont, $400; Connecticut, $350; New York, (southern district,) $450; (northern district,) $450; New Jersey, $350; Pennsylvania, (eastern district,) $400; (western district,) $400; Delaware, $225; Maryland, $450; Virginia, (eastern district,) $400; (western district,) $400; Kentucky, $450; North Carolina, $450; South Carolina, $450; Georgia, $450; Tennessee, (eastern,) $275; (western,) $275; (middle,) $275; Ohio, $500; Indiana, $450; Illinois, $300; Mississippi, (northern,) $200; (southern,) $200; Louisiana, $200; Alabama, (northern,) $200; (southern and middle,) $200; District of Columbia, $150; Michigan, $250; Arkansas, $250; Florida, (five districts, $50 each; Wisconsin, $250; Iowa, $250.

Mr. ADAMS suggested that a larger number of copies of the returns should be printed, (the bill proposed one thousand copies,) and moved five thousand. He supported the motion by dwelling on the importance of the document, and the propriety of preserving it as an historical monument of the condition of the country.

Mr. NAYLOR suggested ten thousand copies.

Mr. ADAMS, after some hesitation, assented to this, and modified his motion accordingly; and it was finally agreed that ten thousand copies be printed.

Mr. GRAVES objected to the allowance proposed for the marshals of Tennessee, and moved to reduce it to $175 for each of the three districts. On this motion he went at large into a speech on the general politics of the country, and especially the practice of levying a percentage on the salaries of officeholders, to be applied to electioneering purposes. In confirmation of his views on this subject, he quoted the printed report of the investigating committee on the Swartwout defalcation, and showed that certain officers of the customs in New York were in the habit of paying such percentage, which was collected from them by a Mr. Vanderpoel, who had a list of the officers for that purpose. He was interrupted in the reading by Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. RIVES, on a question of order; but the Chair, after an explanation by Mr. G., declared that that gentleman was not strictly out of order until he assumed the course of certain members of that committee, which was certainly irrelevant and out of order.

Mr. GRAVES having referred to the case of a postmaster in Mr. FOSTER's district, who was a convicted counterfeiter, who had fled from Massachusetts, and whose bad character had been expressly stated to the head of the Post Office Department, but who was still continued in office, and was a zealous partisan of the Administration,

Mr. GRANT (who comes from the same district with Mr. FOSTER) warmly disclaimed all knowledge of such a case, and with still greater warmth complained of Mr. GRAVES for pronouncing a derogatory opinion respecting the capacity of Mr. Gillett, (who was formerly a member from New York,) to fill any office. Mr. G. pronounced a very high eulogium on the character of Mr. Gillett in all respects.

The discussion between these two gentlemen was continued in a somewhat sharp tone for some time, and was terminated by Mr. EVERETT, who called both to order.

The CHAIRMAN supported Mr. E., and decided the dispute to be out of order.

The question was put on Mr. GRAVES's amendment, and it was negatived.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, the compensation of the Tennessee marshals was fixed at $200.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. GRANT, the House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair) and took up the bill for the continuance of the Cumberland road through the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri—ayes 70, noes 55.

The bill having been read,

Mr. McKENNAN offered an amendment appropriating $20,000 for the erection of guard fences on that portion of the road lying east of the Ohio, and $500 for widening a certain turn in the road on the side of Laurel Hill.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved to appropriate $80,000 for the extension of the road from the Monocacy to Rockville, in Maryland.

This also was rejected.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

It was negatived—ayes 54, noes 70.

Mr. YELL moved to amend the bill by appropriating $65,000 for a road from Memphis to Little Rock, in Arkansas.

Mr. ELMORE moved to amend the bill by striking out the clause which provides that the cost of the road be reimbursed out of the two per cent. fund.

On this motion a highly animated debate arose, in which Messrs. ELMORE, MASON of Ohio, THOMPSON, THOMAS, DAWSON, ROBERTSON, GARLAND of Louisiana, and HEROD participated; when, at about ten o'clock, the committee rose (ayes 63, noes 60) and reported progress.

The census bill was read the third time by its title, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELMORE, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 1, 1839.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, calling for information on the subject of the coinage, deposits for coinage, and the expenses of the Mint and its branches; which was ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL, ETC.

Mr. MOUTON presented the memorial of Pierce and Patrick Shannon, praying permission to import free of duty the materials necessary for the construction of an Iron steamboat; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. LYON presented the proceedings and a memorial adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Saginaw, praying an appropriation to complete the military road from Detroit to Saginaw river; which were laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he had in his possession a number of petitions for the abolition of slavery, which had been sent to him and his colleague, [Mr. Davis.] In some of these they were asked to procure their reference to a select committee; but at this late period, even if the motion prevailed, there would not be sufficient time to give the subject proper attention. The opinions of himself and colleague were well known, both as to the constitutional power of Congress on this subject, and as to the great and undoubted right of petition, and their opinions were unchanged. He moved that the petitions be received.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the motion to receive was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which had been referred the following, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to:

Memorial of the American Silk Society; Petition of Thomas J. Durant and J. Towser; Memorial of Charles Fleischman; and Memorial of Russel Comstock.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Finance have leave to sit during the hours of the session of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, it was Ordered, That fifty thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted to the Senate on the 4th of July last, be printed for the use of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year 1839, and the other acts ordered to be engrossed for a third reading yesterday, were severally read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted the following communication from the Postmaster General:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, February 27, 1839.

SIR: Just as my messenger was about to start for the Capitol with several communications, including my reply to the resolution of the Senate adopted on the 13th instant, I received their resolution of this day, asking why the information then called for has not been communicated.

In reply, I have the honor to state, that the only reason I have to give why it has not been before communicated is that it was not ready.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON,
Vice President and President of the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER moved that the letter be referred to the President of the United States, with a request that he dismiss the Postmaster General for an insult to the Senate of the United States.

A debate ensued, in which Messrs. SEVIER, FOSTER, TALLMADGE, CRITTENDEN, WEBSTER, BUCHANAN, SMITH of Connecticut, WALKER, BENTON, ALLEN, CALHOUN, LINN, and NILES, participated; at the conclusion of which,

Mr. SEVIER modified his motion as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of the Postmaster General to the President of the Senate, stating that the only reason why he had not sent an answer to a previous resolution was, because it was not ready, is considered by the Senate as disrespectful to this body.

Resolved, That said letter, with the resolution to which it purports to be an answer, be laid before the President of the United States for such action as he may deem proper.

The question was taken on the resolutions separately; and the first was adopted—ayes 38, noes 8; the second—ayes 31, noes 15.

So the resolutions were adopted.

After passing a number of private bills, the Senate took a recess until five o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received the resolution of the Senate of this day, upon the subject of a communication made to you by the Postmaster General on the 27th ultimo, and have the satisfaction of laying before the Senate the accompanying letter from that officer, in which he fully disclaims any intended disrespect to the Senate in the communication referred to.

M. VAN BUREN.

March 1, 1839.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, March 1, 1839.

SIR: In reference to the resolution of the Senate adopted this day, and by you just communicated to me, expressing the opinion that a communication made by me on the 27th ultimo, in reply to their resolution of the same date, was disrespectful to that body, I have only to say that no disrespect was intended or felt.

Their resolution of the 13th ultimo, calling for the names of removed postmasters, designated no specific time within which the information would be wanted; and as it did not appear to look to any legislative or executive action on their part, the necessity of great expedition in preparing and communicating them, to the delay of other pressing matters, was not appreciated by me so highly as it appears to have been by the Senate, or as perhaps it ought to have been. And as the reply to the resolution of the 12th was already in the hands of the messenger, and would accompany the reply to that of the 27th, showing that no disposition existed to withhold the information called for, it did not occur to me that any detailed explanation why it had not been sooner sent was necessary, or would be expected: Hence it will be perceived that the letter complained of was written hastily, (the messenger having been, in fact, detained until it could be written and recorded;) and but for the hurry of the moment, not allowing time for consideration, I should probably have given the more full explanation contained in this letter.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

The Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill making appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1839, reported the same with several amendments.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

An act making appropriations for the Army for the year 1839 was taken up, and after several amendments had been offered and decided on,

Mr. BENTON offered an amendment appropriating $740,000 for putting certain old fortifications in a state of efficiency, and for completing new works which are not yet finished.

This amendment was supported by Messrs. BENTON and DAVIS, and opposed by Mr. CALHOUN; and on taking the question, it was lost—ayes 14, noes 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Nicholas, Robbins, Ruggles, Walker, Wall, Webster, and Williams of Maine—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Foster, Hubbard, Lyon, McKean, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—23.

After several amendments, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

FRONTIER PROTECTION.

An act making appropriations for the protection of the northern and northwestern frontier was taken up, and after being considered as in Committee of the Whole, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred a bill from the House, making an appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1839, reported the same with an amendment; which was considered and adopted.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, offered an amendment making an appropriation for property taken by officers of the Government in the campaign against the Creek Indians, which he advocated at some length, as a measure of long deferred justice to many citizens whose property had been appropriated to the use of the Government. The amendment was rejected—ayes 11, noes 26.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and afterwards read the third time and passed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

An act giving to the President of the United States additional powers in defense of the United States, in case of invasion, and for other purposes;

An act to alter and amend the organic law of the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa;

An act to establish and define the eastern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa;

An act to authorize the election and appointment of certain officers in the Territory of Iowa and for other purposes;

An act to amend an act entitled an act regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers, approved April 16, 1818; and

An act for the relief of Captain John Vannettin and his company for their services during the late war.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then went into executive session; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839, was taken up for consideration, and after several amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance had been concurred in, the amendment of the committee proposing to strike out the following section, was considered:

"For the balance due on account of the first volume of the Documentary History of the United States, $5,602; and the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to deliver to the Secretary of the Senate forty copies of said work, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives three hundred and sixty-eight copies of said work, to be distributed to each of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Twenty-Third, Twenty-Fourth, and Twenty-Fifth Congresses, who are not entitled to receive the same under former resolutions or acts of Congress."

Mr. WEBSTER hoped that the Senate would not strike out this appropriation. It was, in his opinion, a very small matter, and too unimportant to be wasting the time of the Senate on at this late period of the session. The House had thought proper to make this appropriation to fulfill the obligations of a contract entered into by this Government, and he thought the proper way was to agree to it, and not to hazard the loss of the bill and the consequent stopping of the Government by delaying the passage of it. If gentlemen would persist in consuming time, and were determined to higggle with the House on this appropriation of $5,000, he had warned them of the consequences, and they must take the responsibility.

Mr. WRIGHT said: If the Senator from Massachusetts thinks I am not aware of my responsibility, or that I fear to meet it, he does not know me. Mr. W. thought the time was come when the Senate should make a stand upon this subject, and said the responsibility of defeating this bill, if it was lost, would rest with those who had incorporated this provision into it. Mr. W. went on at some length in opposition to the practice of appropriating money for the purchase of books, and distributing them among themselves, and trusted that the Senate would not countenance it any longer.

After some remarks from Mr. BENTON in favor of the amendment, the question was taken on the recommendation of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER announced there was not a quorum in attendance.

Mr. SEVIER moved that there be a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER said the Senator from Arkansas might reach his object by moving that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to summon the absent Senators, and if they refused attending, the Presiding Officer might issue his warrant, and have them brought before the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER modified his motion accordingly.

Several Senators requested Mr. S. to withdraw his motion.

Mr. WALKER hoped that the Senator from Arkansas would persist in it. The only Senators who were invalids and whose healths were endangered by the protracted sittings of that body, were in their seats attending to their public duties, while a majority of the Senate, who had not the plea of illness to offer as an excuse for their absence, were in their beds. He hoped the motion would be persisted in, and that Senators, if other motives could not induce them to do so, would be compelled by order of the body to attend to the public business.

After some conversation the motion was withdrawn, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 1, 1839.

Mr. GRAY asked leave to submit a resolution giving the pages and messengers of the House an extra allowance of $250 over and above their pay for their three months' services.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, objected.

The SPEAKER, however, said the unfinished business must first be disposed of. This was the report from the select committee on Virginia bounty warrants, the reading of which was not concluded yesterday.

Mr. GRAY said he hoped it would be passed over for the present.

Mr. BRIGGS should object, because, if passed over this morning, it would not be reached again, and the object of the committee be defeated.

The reading of the report was resumed, and various ineffectual efforts were made to dispense with it; but it again occupied the whole morning hour without being brought to a conclusion.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, on leave, reported, without amendment, Senate joint resolution authorizing the opening of an alley and the execution of certain deeds in the city of Washington.

Also, Senate bill, without amendment, to extend the jurisdiction of the corporation of the city of Washington over the Potomac bridge.

Also, Senate bill to incorporate Georgetown College, in the District of Columbia.

The above bills and resolution were severally read the third time and passed.

Mr. EWING moved to suspend the special order for one hour, to go into committee on the Cumberland road bill.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" from all parts of the Hall.]

The motion was rejected by a large majority.

Mr. GRAVES asked the House to take up the resolution submitted by him some time since, in relation to the alleged defalcation of Charles J. Ingersoll, late district attorney at Philadelphia; but it was objected to.

Mr. MERCER moved a suspension of the special order for half an hour, to enable the committees to report; but the motion was rejected.

Mr. GRANT asked leave to make an explanation in relation to the debate between himself and Mr. GRAVES last night; but it was refused.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The following executive communications were received, and ordered to lie on the table:

A message from the President of the United States, in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 18th January last, calling for a copy of a dispatch from Mr. Stevenson, our Minister at London, on the subject of the tobacco trade.

A communication from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of his accounts settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury, for the third and fourth quarters of 1837, and the first and second quarters of 1838.

A letter from the Secretary of War, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th ultimo, calling for a statement of the proceedings of his Department in the execution of the first and second provisions of the fourth article of the treaty of the 1st November, 1837, with the Winnebago Indians.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and one of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the 16th ultimo, calling for information in reference to the treaty with the Pottawatomie Indians of the 25th, 26th, and 27th of October, 1832.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Second Auditor, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th of January last, in relation to the execution of the treaties of 1832 and 1834, with the Chickasaw Indians, and the treaty of 1830, with the Choc-taws.

A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance, as far as practicable, with the resolution of the House of the 31st December last, in relation to the condition of the banks in Wisconsin.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

The House then, in pursuance of the special order, went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair) on the "bill giving to the President of the United States additional powers for the defense of the United States, in certain cases, against invasion, and for other purposes."

After some conversation as to the order of proceeding, Mr. PICKENS giving notice of his intention to move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON suggested a modification of the first section, so as not to assume that Great Britain "set up a claim" to exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. MENEFEE wished the phraseology made so clear that the Executive should resist an occupation of this territory, either on the part of the Government of Great Britain, directing and acting on her own responsibility, or through her provincial authorities.

Mr. CRAIG saw no necessity for making any distinction.

Mr. BIDDLE said he was not prepared to vote for any part of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS saw no necessity for Mr. ROBERTSON'S amendment. The case did not apply as it did yesterday to the report, because it was there asserted that an "agreement" was set up by Great Britain. Now there was a "claim." She set up a claim, and so did we.

Mr. ROBERTSON immediately withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HOWARD could see no necessity of drawing the distinction indicated by Mr. MENEFEE.

Mr. MENEFEE still thought provision ought to be made to meet both cases.

Mr. NAYLOR, to meet this objection, and obviate all confusion or difficulty that might hereafter arise, moved to insert after "Great Britain" the words "or her provincial authorities."

Mr. KENNEDY approved entirely of the principles of the report, and should support the bill as it had been brought in by Mr. HOWARD. He then went on to read a number of extracts from the dispatches of Sir Charles Vaughan, etc., to show that Great Britain did set up a pretension to exclusive jurisdiction pending the controversy, and added that he had no doubt, from the tenor of these documents, that Sir John Harvey had received specific instructions and orders to assert and maintain that jurisdiction. Mr. K. said he should move the printing of this with the other documents.

Mr. ELMORE inquired if these papers had been communicated to our Government?

Mr. KENNEDY replied that they had not.

Mr. ELMORE. Then, it is a private paper, with which we have nothing to do.

Mr. LEGARE was of a different opinion, in spite of these documents, and did not believe any such specific orders had been received by the Provincial Governor from the British Ministry. The amendment of Mr. NAYLOR he considered as entirely unnecessary.

Mr. BIDDLE agreed with Mr. ADAMS that it was desirable we should keep ourselves right, and therefore he was indisposed to run into collateral questions; for he was one of those who believed this question would have to be settled with arms. He desired, therefore, that with such a Power as Great Britain we should use nothing like bravado, set up nothing like a bugbear. The mere unanimity of that House would have no effect upon a proud nation like that. This course had been tried towards Mexico, and she had treated us with contempt in return. These experiments would achieve nothing.

Mr. HOWARD explained. Two years ago, in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he had again and again given it as his opinion that the pacific course afterwards adopted would be ineffectual. He was for a different policy.

Mr. BIDDLE had adduced this as an illustration, and because the same course seemed now about to be adopted. If we did go to war, he hoped it would not terminate as the last did, by leaving the question in suspension. If, however, we went to war, it should always be on such a question as should unite our whole people; upon which they would think and dwell night and morning; upon which they could rally. Was the present such a question? It was not. Even in view of all the atrocities of the late war, when our whole coast was plundered, and hundreds of families reduced to ruin; when our commerce was almost annihilated, our seamen forcibly taken and made to serve against their country, with the popular cry of "free trade and sailors' rights," what was the scene exhibited? So far from that general unanimity indispensable to success, one half the country was almost in friendly alliance with the enemy, and the pulpit poured its blessings upon them as the main pillar of religion.

Mr. B. then went on to show that the present was not such a question as warranted our hurrying ourselves into a long and sanguinary war, and he cited a speech of Mr. EVANS, made a year ago, to prove that this mere question of jurisdiction was viewed as a matter of very small importance by the State of Maine; and if she, who was directly interested, had made a light matter of it, why should we be now called upon to issue a declaration of war thereon? For he regarded the step now about to be taken as equivalent to a declaration of war. Mr. B. went on at length to demonstrate that exaggerated importance had been given to this question all at once, and insisted that acquiescence in the jurisdiction of Great Britain over the disputed territory had been yielded from 1824 down by the General Government, and distinctly recognized by the Legislature of Massachusetts. To sustain this position he cited a variety of documents. To go to war now upon the new question involved, would be to go to war for the shadow after having abandoned the substance. It was one upon which the people of this country could never be rallied; but if the President came there, and told them that all negotiation was at an end, and that there was no resort left but to arms, then he was prepared to go into it even to the ruin of himself and those he represented. He implored the House to pause, and not to rush prematurely into a contest, the termination of which no one could foretell.

Mr. HOWARD deemed the amendment offered by Mr. NAYLOR as entirely unnecessary, because the whole case was fully met in the general terms of the bill.

Mr. H. said he had listened to the speech of Mr. BIDDLE with surprise and regret. The sum and substance of the gentleman's argument was, that the President was wrong in the position he had taken, because the administration of General Jackson had suffered this question to remain dormant. Was that an argument (Mr. H. would inquire) to be used upon a question like this? Refuse to pass this bill, adopt the course recommended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and where would the country be? Would it renew the negotiation? It could not; and the Governor of New Brunswick might go on with the invasion, or might not. Pass no law; adjourn; make no appropriation, and refuse to sustain the President in the lofty grounds he has taken; and what will be the consequence? They send him into the field at the head of the militia he has called out, crippled by the refusal of the House to sustain him in whatever consideration of national honor calls upon him to do. Surely the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be the last to desire this. Nothing was to be gained by refusing to pass this bill; much, perhaps everything, to be lost. He trusted this threatening crisis would pass away peaceably. He was for peace, so long as it could be preserved without impairing the national honor, but no longer; and in saying this he spoke the sentiments of those he represented. In reply to Mr. BIDDLE, he also contended that the issue was a plain one, to be understood by every one. He held that Sir John Harvey must be supposed capable of understanding his orders; and it was no more improbable that he had received specific orders of the character referred to, than that the commander of the infamous expedition against the Caroline, and the murder of her defenseless crew, should be rewarded with the subsequent command of the lake frontier of Canada. He stated that he was instructed to move to fill up the blank with $10,000,000, when they reached that part of the bill.

Again: refuse to pass this measure, adjourn and do nothing, and if circumstances should arise rendering an extraordinary convening of Congress necessary, the first thing they must do would be to pass a law in the terms of the second section of this bill. As for the idea of a threat, he disclaimed it; no such idea was entertained by the committee.

Mr. BIDDLE explained. He never intended to say, but only referred to what might be the impression of the British Government. He agreed with the President, and wished no premature leaning to a military resort.

Mr. HOWARD said, as their debates went forth, the disclaimer was necessary. The plan proposed, he insisted, was pacific, but at the same time it was one that, if war was forced upon us, we should not be unprepared. He had no fears of the people not rallying an issue like this, and no comparison should be drawn between our present condition and resources and that of 1812. The bill, however, was but an initiatory step, and only authorized action on the part of the Executive in an extreme case, when all pacific expedients have failed.

Mr. EVANS followed in reply to Mr. BIDDLE, and in support of the bill, but before he had proceeded far the hour arrived for the House to take its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. EVANS resumed his speech after the adjournment, and continued to occupy the floor for a considerable time, when he was succeeded by Mr. FILLMORE, who urged some provision for the defense of the lakes, and laid on the table an amendment empowering the President to arm and equip as many steamboats as he might deem necessary for that end.

Mr. MENEFEE spoke with great earnestness on the necessity of vindicating the national honor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL opposed the bill as premature, and read extensively from the documents to show that Great Britain had no right to claim the existence of any understanding between the two Governments for her exclusive possession of the disputed territory, yet the course of our Government had been such as to encourage such an idea; and therefore we ought to give time for explanation. He charged Maine with rashness and indiscretion in the movement which she had made.

Mr. LEGARE defended the bill, denied it was a war measure, but insisted that its tendency was to peace. He examined the question of right, and vindicated the stand taken by the State of Maine.

Mr. PICKENS replied to the remarks of Mr. MENEFEE, and said that national interest ought to be looked at as well as national honor. He deprecated war, and thought peace might be preserved, but was prepared to go any length when war was inevitable. He opposed the second section of the bill, which empowers the President to raise twenty new regiments, &c.

Mr. NAYLOR insisted that it would be an empty bravado to pass the rest of the bill, and not the second section, which gave vitality and force to the whole. He concluded that the country must do something in the case, and supported the bill as fit and necessary.

Mr. PRENTISS replied to some of the remarks of Mr. PICKENS, and treated with ridicule the idea of looking at interest when honor was at stake. He went into an examination of the several parts of the bill, opposed the second section, and wished the residue better guarded, and the discretion of the President more restricted.

Mr. HOFFMAN went into an explanation of the reason why, although a Representative of a great commercial emporium, which must be most sensibly injured by war, should it come, he gave his support to the bill. He then went into a brief examination of the existing difficulty, and insisted on the necessity of supporting the national rights and character at every sacrifice.

Mr. THOMPSON followed in a similar course of remark, commenting with great severity on the injustice and arrogance of the British claims, and the course of the provincial government on this occasion, and pledged his constituents and himself, to the whole extent of their means, to stand by the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved the substance of the foundery bill to be inserted as an amendment.

Mr. WISE treated the whole debate as a matter of amusement. Those who talked so much seldom were great doers. The whole danger, as he understood, was like to pass away; but if not, he opposed giving to any President powers so large as those in the bill. He offered, by way of substitute, the resolutions moved in the Senate by Mr. BUCHANAN, and then moved that the committee rise; but consented to withdraw the motion under a pledge that it should be renewed.

Mr. EVANS stated that information had been received through the papers by the evening mail, that a special messenger had passed through Augusta, Maine, with dispatches from Sir John Harvey for the British Minister here, the contents unknown, but generally understood and believed to be expressive of his determination to take no further step until the reception of the Minister's reply. It was not certainly true, though he was strongly inclined to believe that it was.

He then went into a course of very severe animadversion on the speech of Mr. SALTONSTALL, particularly as coming from a member from Massachusetts, who had been the first to resist British aggression; and, as a contrast to the positions of that gentleman, read a series of resolutions, just received, from the Legislature of Massachusetts, fully supporting Maine in all she had done, and proffering for her aid the loan of $1,000,000. He further stated that an agent of Massachusetts had accompanied the agent of Maine in the late transactions, and had concurred fully in all that was done; that the party who went to support the sheriff, though they had arms with them to resist, if need be, an armed body of trespassers which they understood to be collected in a considerable force within the territory, had taken care to carry their boxes up, and had determined not to open the boxes until the actual necessity arrived of a forcible conflict. It was not a military expedition, but strictly a civil one to enforce the execution of a writ. As to the secret session of the Legislature, it had been secret to conceal the movement, not from the General Government here, or the Provincial Government beyond the lines, but from the trespassers, whom it was desirable to seize before they could make good their retreat.

After some general remarks on the necessity, whether the pacific intelligence were true or false, of still passing the bill, Mr. E., according to his pledge, moved the rising of the committee, but hoped the motion would not prevail.

[It was now midnight.]

The question being put, it was carried, and thereupon the committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was ordered that the consideration of this bill be the special order for to-morrow at eleven o'clock, to take precedence of all other business.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a reconsideration of the vote on a bill for the benefit of the Georgetown College, but did not press it.

Mr. WISE obtained the printing of his substitute for the military preparation bill.

The House took up sundry bills on the Speaker's table, which had come back from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments to the bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez were concurred in, and the bill passed.

The Senate's amendment to the bill for the erection of a new jail in Washington, requiring the addition of $1,000 to the appropriation by the House of $30,000 for the erection of that building. The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House bill for the support of the Army, with sundry amendments from the Senate, was referred in like manner.

The Senate's amendment to the bill for the relief of the Springfield Manufacturing Company having been read,

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, moved that the said amendment be non-concurred in.

Various attempts were made to get a quorum on this motion, and several motions for adjournment were made, the last of which succeeded—yeas 73, nays 59.

So the House (at half past twelve o'clock) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 2, 1839.

Mr. HUBBARD presented a petition from citizens of New Hampshire, for a post route; which was laid on the table.

Mr. H. also presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to obtain the adjustment of claims for spoils committed by France prior to 1800; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS presented several petitions for the abolition of slavery; which he asked might be received.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the motion to receive was laid upon the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred several memorials on the subject of a steam revenue cutter, made a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolutions and memorials concerning the construction of steam revenue cutters, with a copy of this report be referred to the Secretary of the Navy.

The resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. CUTHBERT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the heirs of Robert Fulton, made a special report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON, was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, reports upon the military and naval defenses of the country, showing—

First. The fortifications, or other permanent defenses, commenced, completed, projected, or deemed necessary—
1. For the northern frontier, from Lake Superior to Passamaquoddy bay; 2. For the maritime frontier, from Passamaquoddy bay to Cape Florida; 3. The Gulf frontier, from Cape Florida to Sabine bay; 4. The western frontier, from the Sabine bay to Lake Superior, with a conjectural estimate of the probable expense of constructing or completing such works as may not yet have been completed or commenced.

Second. The state of the armament of the fortifications, so far as the same may be completed or commenced, with a conjectural estimate of the expense of completing the armament of all the forts which may be commenced, or deemed necessary to be constructed.

Third. The armories, arsenals, magazines, and foundries, either constructed or deemed necessary, with a conjectural estimate of the expense of constructing such of said establishments as may not yet be completed or commenced, but which may be deemed necessary.

Fourth. The floating or steam batteries, or vessels which have been constructed in aid of fortifications, or may be deemed necessary to be constructed in aid of such works, with a conjectural estimate of the expense which the same may require.

Fifth. The ships of war built, or under construction, or deemed necessary to be built, with a conjectural estimate of the expense of building and arming the vessels not yet completed or commenced, or which may be deemed necessary within a reasonable time.

Sixth. The navy-yards, docks, and naval establishments of every kind, either constructed or commenced, or deemed necessary, with the probable expense of completing the same.

With any other information or suggestions which the President may deem necessary to be communicated to Congress, in order to exhibit a full view of what is necessary to be done, and the probable cost thereof, to place the United States in a proper state of defense, by land and water, and on each of the four great lines of defense which her frontiers present.

Mr. DAVIS offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, whether any change in the system of marine hospitals is expedient; and if so, what; and especially if any new hospitals are necessary, and in what manner they ought to be erected, if deemed expedient, and how supported.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839 was taken up; and the question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, to strike out the appropriation for the Documentary History—

Mr. BENTON spoke at much length against the appropriation, and also against the distribution of the books, and read from reports of committees to justify what he said. He considered this whole business of printing books for members of Congress—a practice which had grown up within a few years past—to be one of the most abominable abuses which now beset the Government, and he considered this particular job as the most abominable of the whole. Taken in every way, the manner in which it was got through without the knowledge of the most attentive members—he meant others still more than himself—the enormity of the sum involved; the vast bulk and little worth of the work; and the distribution of it to the members that voted for it, and it was truly an enormous abuse. None of us knew that such a work was authorized by us. It was passed in 1833, and it was nearly a year afterwards before we discovered what we had done. He found it out from Mr. MANGUM, of North Carolina, at the next session, who was a member of the committee who discovered what had been done; and then, for the first time, it was found out that an act had been passed by which upwards of half a million dollars, at the least, and probably a million and a half, was to be given to an officer of the House of Representatives (M. St. Clair Clarke, the Clerk of the House) and his partner, for printing a work to be given to those who voted that officer and his partner the money? As soon as found out, the abuse was resisted by some members, has been resisted for six years, but without effect; for while a majority condemn and denounce it, yet they are placed under duress, and compelled to vote for the money and the distribution by putting them in the appropriation bills for the support of the Government, and then making it a question to lose the whole bill and stop the Government, or let the distribution go on. He, for one, would vote against it, and let the Government stop, if that should be the consequence; and let the people see who it was that would break up the Government before they would cease voting books to themselves! Even if the vote of the books was right in itself, it would be wrong to put it in an appropriation bill; and he would not be coerced by finding it there.

But the whole practice was wrong in itself, and was becoming an enormous abuse; enormous for the amount of money, enormous for the principle, enormous for the frightful progress which it made, enormous for the consequences it might lead to. Every session we have jobs and distributions. A multitude of works have been printed and distributed. They multiply every session. We vote the money to the jobber; the jobber gives the books to us; and many of us sell the books instantly to Mr. Templeman, or some other purchaser. Twenty thousand, forty thousand, sixty thousand dollars, is a common vote, and done with a rapidity which defies all description, and in a way to escape the notice of the most attentive members. But this is a case, not of twenty, or forty, or sixty thousand dollars, but of one or two millions? It is absolutely a case of millions, and may be as many as the jobbers choose to make it. It is without limits or boundaries. It is to print whatever the jobbers choose to print—for there is no earthly control over them—under the name of Documentary History of the Revolution. Already they inform us that the private and public libraries of America and Europe are to be explored to find either manuscript or printed matter to be published; and they are at liberty to publish all that they can find. The first computation supposed it might amount to $1,500,000; then the undertakers, when the enormity of that sum startled everybody, proposed to put a limit on themselves by limiting the number of volumes. They proposed to limit the volumes to twenty, and left the number of pages unlimited, though estimated for at eight hundred pages. The pay was by the page—so much the page—and at this rate it would come to $20,400 a volume; and twenty volumes would make $408,000. This seemed to impose a limit, but it was all an illusion! The number of pages was unlimited; and instead of eight hundred, the first volume (the only one printed) contained over one thousand pages! and instead of $20,400, the estimated price, the actual price is $26,000; and by doubling the pages, the next one may be $52,000! This bill is to pay a balance—a balance due for the first volume; and this balance is $5,600! the estimated price of $20,400 having been previously paid. At this rate the twenty volumes will cost $520,000; but there is nothing to limit it to that amount; the publishers can print what they please, as many volumes as they please, and as many pages as they please in each volume; and being paid by the page, the bulk of the work and the amount of the price are absolutely without limit!

It is also without limit as to time! It may last for centuries, and through generations; and the families of Mr. Clarke and Mr. Force may be pensioned on the Federal Government through successive ages. It is a personal contract with Messrs. Clarke and Force; it will descend to their representatives; it has taken six years to make one volume; and twenty volumes, even if limited to that, would require at the same rate, one hundred and twenty years to complete the work. So slow is the forthcoming work, that we have been told on this floor—told by Mr. KING, who began the good work of opposing this business—that he was well informed that a member had sold his interest in the whole Documentary History, for which we pay a million or so, for ten dollars in hand.

Mr. B. then took the ground that the whole contract ought to be set aside, for fraud: first, in the manner of getting it through Congress in a way to prevent all knowledge of the magnitude of the work, and that by an officer of the House; next for want of moral or constitutional power in the Congress to vote themselves such presents; third, for the manner in which the price was fixed, and fixed nearly twice too much—as he proved by reading answers to inquiries from the most eminent booksellers of Philadelphia and other cities, addressed to them by a committee of the House of Representatives after the discovery of the extent of the job given to Messrs. Clarke and Force. He read from the report to show that Messrs. Clarke and Force virtually fixed the price themselves, by putting it into the face of the law, that they were to have at the same rate that Messrs. Blair & Rives were paid for a certain work, the price of which was fixed by Mr. Force, who was selected by Mr. Clarke and Mr. Lowry for that purpose; Clarke and Force's bill depending in Congress, while Mr. Force, as a referee, was fixing the price of work which was to govern his own.

Mr. B. finished with declaring that this book-printing and book-distributing business had become an enormous abuse; that the attention of the country ought to be roused up to it; and if the bill for the support of the Government was lost, it would rouse the country, and, in the end, save millions. For his own part, he had been resisting this business for six years without any effect, for it was growing and increasing annually. But he should go on opposing it, opposing all these jobs, great and small. He had to encounter friends and foes, and to draw on himself censure and opposition. He was sorry for it, but could not help it. The abuse must be stopped; and he had taken a fixed and inexorable resolution to try and stop it. He had put on his iron nerves, and should yield to neither friends nor foes.

Mr. SOUTHWARD spoke in reply, insisting that this sum was due under a contract which was a law of the land; and that Congress, before withholding appropriations, ought to declare that contract null and void, which no one dared to propose in direct terms, or else they ought to make a compromise, and allow Clarke and Force suitable damages.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would vote for this appropriation, but a sense of duty would not allow him to vote in favor of giving books to members of Congress. He agreed, however, if Clarke and Force should suffer damage on account of a failure in Congress to fulfill a contract, they ought to be remunerated.

On the call of Mr. FOSTER, the question was divided so as to ascertain, first, whether the Senate would make this appropriation; and, second, whether the books should be distributed as provided for by the bill.

The former of these questions was decided in the negative, thus striking out the appropriation of $5,602 by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, and Webster—13.

The question on the distribution of the books was negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Southard, and Webster—3.

The amendment to strike out the proviso, which required the printing, &c., of the Executive Departments to be done by contract, to be given to the lowest bidder, being before the Senate,

Mr. WRIGHT said the committee had recommended this amendment, because in their view a compliance with the requisitions of the proviso was impracticable; it amounted to a total denial to the departments of the power of having any printing done whatever. There was no obligation on the contractor to reside, or to perform the work, in this city; and the Departments would be compelled on every emergency in which they required a job of printing to be done, to send it perhaps to Boston to be executed. He hoped the proposed amendment of the committee would be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to a third reading, and, by unanimous consent, was read the third time and passed.

This bill was subsequently returned from the House, with the information that the House non-concurred in the two above principal amendments made by the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, moved that the Senate insist on their first amendment striking out the provision for letting out the public printing on contract; which was agreed to.

Also, that the Senate recede from the amendment striking out the appropriation for the Documentary History, which was agreed to—yeas 23, nays 6.

Also, that the Senate insist on their amendment striking out the provision for the distribution of these books among the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, which after some remarks from Mr. WEBSTER, in opposition, was agreed to—yeas 23, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Walker, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and Young—7.

POSTMASTER'S EXPLANATION.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President's message, of the 1st instant, and the accompanying letter of the Postmaster General, in answer to certain resolutions of the Senate adopted on the 1st instant, in relation to a communication previously made to the Senate by the Postmaster General, are satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. A. desired the consideration of the resolution at this time; but, this requiring the unanimous consent of the Senate,

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, objected.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed a hope that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SMITH] would withdraw his objection. The Postmaster General had expressly disclaimed all intentional disrespect to the Senate in his former communication. He had never believed, and he had so expressed himself, that this officer intended any disrespect to the body, although, without this disavowal, his communication would fairly bear such a construction. He had now disavowed all such intention, and therefore the Senate ought to express themselves satisfied.

Mr. SMITH still persisting in his objection, the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. ALLEN then said that by the rules he could call up his resolution to-morrow; and that as the day would terminate at twelve o'clock, he gave notice that he would take the earliest occasion thereafter to call for its consideration.

FRONTIER PROTECTION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill from the House for the protection of the northern and northwestern frontier.

Mr. BENTON, from the Military Committee, reported various amendments to the bill, making an aggregate of $1,240,000, viz: $740,000 for fortifications much advanced, and $500,000 for others not much advanced.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to increase the appropriation for fortifications in Maine from $100,000 to $200,000.

This motion was briefly advocated by Messrs. WILLIAMS, of Maine, and RUGGLES, and opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT, and CLAY of Alabama.

The amendment was negated without a division.

The appropriation of $100,000 for Maine fortifications was also negated by yeas and nays; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Norvell, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, Williams of Maine, and Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, White, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—22.

The appropriation of $80,000 for the western frontier was advocated at some length by Mr. FULTON and Mr. BENTON, and opposed by Mr. CALHOUN.

The appropriation was carried in the affirmative, by yeas and nays; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Foster, Fulton, Linn, Lyon, Norvell, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Hubbard, King, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Swift, Wall, and Wright—17.

The appropriations of $740,000 for fortifications and other military defenses on the Atlantic and Gulf coast were now taken together, advocated by Mr. BENTON and Mr. DAVIS, who stated that there was recently not a gun at Boston in a condition to fire a salute, which he supposed was generally the case; and opposed by Mr. CALHOUN, who said there were always ready guns by hundreds when he was connected with the Department; and if the millions recently appropriated had been thus wasted, this pittance would do nothing; and then this whole appropriation was negated, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Nicholas, Robbins, Ruggles, Walker, Wall, Webster, and Williams of Maine—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Foster, Hubbard, Lyon, McKean, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, White, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—23.

The bill, as amended, was now reported to the Senate; and, after a brief conversation, the appropriation of $80,000 for the western frontier, made in committee, was non-concurred in, or lost, in Senate, by yeas and nays; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Fulton, Linn, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Walker, Webster, White, and Williams of Maine—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, King, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Swift, Wall, and Wright—18.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, and by consent read the third time and passed.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S EXPLANATION.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN, relative to the letter of the Postmaster General, was, on his motion, called up and agreed to, without a division.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

The bill from the House giving to the President of the United States additional powers for the defense of the United States in certain cases against invasion, and for other purposes, was received, the 16th joint rule in the way of its reception was suspended, and the Senate proceeded forthwith to consider the bill. After having been read the first time,

Mr. BENTON observed that he did not think it necessary, at this late period of the session, and under present circumstances, to refer this bill to a committee. The subject was perfectly understood by every Senator; the bill, as it had passed the House, was on their tables; and the sense of the Senate had been fully expressed in the resolutions unanimously adopted last evening. He therefore thought that they had better not refer the bill, but take it up in Committee of the Whole, and act on it at once.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that the bill from the House, now before the Senate, entirely met his approbation, with perhaps a single exception. Under all the circumstances, he doubted the policy of sending a special minister to England; but he should make no motion to strike this provision from the bill, unless his doubts might be fortified by the opinion of other Senators. With this exception, if such it ought to be considered, the bill, he believed, was just such a one as the Committee on Foreign Relations would have unanimously reported to the Senate, had it not been deemed more proper that this measure should originate in the House. It was precisely in accordance with the resolutions which had passed the Senate last night, by which we pledged ourselves, that in case the British Government should attempt to take possession of this disputed territory, we should stand by the President of the United States, and sustain him with all the military power of the nation in repelling this aggression. This bill contained no provisional army. It simply authorized a resort to the militia and volunteers, in case it should become necessary to call out a military force before Congress could be convened, and appropriated the money necessary to accomplish the object. Mr. B. agreed with his friend from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] that it was unnecessary to refer this bill to a committee, as it was plain and simple in its provisions, and the session so near its close. As to the propriety of sending a special minister to England, he would be glad to hear the opinion of other Senators on this subject.

Mr. TALLMADGE observed that he differed with the Senator from Pennsylvania in one particular. He was highly in favor of sending a special minister to England. He thought the minister sent should be a man of character and standing, and he had no idea that the President would send any other.

Mr. SOUTHARD acknowledged that he felt great difficulty in passing so promptly on a bill of such magnitude. He did not view it in the light that other Senators did, as carrying out the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but going far beyond them. He greatly feared the consequences of passing such a bill, and was alarmed at what would be the result of its passage. For if it did pass, and the President should call for the volunteers authorized by it, there would be a war between this country and Great Britain which might last for years. Where were these volunteers to be raised, and how? The moment (said Mr. S.) that this bill is passed, you will find volunteers assembling under it, and eager to march into the British territories.

Now, I ask you to look upon the whole of our frontiers, and see what has occurred there during the past twelve months, together with the tone and temper of the people. Did it not require all the exertions of the Executive to repress the spirit that was so openly manifested? He would as soon vote for an absolute declaration of war as this bill. The great danger was that the volunteers would not wait for the orders of the President of the United States, but that they would, as soon as organized, invade the British territory, and thus bring on a war while the two Governments were in the progress of adjusting the differences between them. There were other provisions of this bill to which he was not prepared to give his assent, and there were others which he approved of, and among the latter was the one referred to by the Senator from New York. He hoped that a special minister would be sent to England, and that the mission would result in the settlement of all our differences with that Power. God forbid that a war between this country and England, the representatives of the freedom of the world, should ever take place. He did not fear the contest, if it should be forced on him; but (said he) if we go into this conflict, I wish to go into it coolly and dispassionately, and in a manner calculated to carry with us the feelings of the people of the whole country. He preferred that the bill should be sent to a committee, with a view to a more mature consideration of the whole subject, and the recommendation of some measure less calculated to precipitate the country into a war. In the present posture of affairs, this section authorizing the raising of volunteers, would be looked on by the British Government in no other light than as a menace, and perhaps lead this high-spirited people into acts of hostility, which more moderate measures on our part might prevent. How could we expect any successful negotiations for terminating our differences with the British Government, with this threat hanging over them? Would they not point to it as an act of hostility, and refuse to negotiate until it was withdrawn?

Mr. S., after some further remarks, concluded by moving to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TALLMADGE did not know that he had any objections to the reference of the bill; the remark he made was in regard to the sending of a minister. But he saw no cause for the alarm felt by the Senator from New Jersey. No one could pretend that volunteers would be raised under the provisions of this bill till the President called for them; and after he has called for them, they will, as soon as raised, be in the service of the United States, and cannot go to Canada, or anywhere else, without orders. He could not agree with the Senator from New Jersey that any part of this bill could justly be viewed as a threat or menace. We have been threatened with invasion, and, though he did not believe that the threat would be carried into execution, yet it was highly necessary to be prepared for any such contingency. Should the British Government complain of this clause of the bill as a menace, which he did not believe they would do, the President could say, that from the very nature of our institutions, we were unprepared for any emergency, and therefore it was that Congress passed this measure in order that we might be prepared to meet the invasion that was threatened. We shall always enter into a conflict with a foreign Power under disadvantageous circumstances, but we shall become stronger as it progresses, and triumph in the end. He did believe that this bill was necessary, and he would therefore give it his vote. We passed (said he) unanimously the resolutions

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONGRESS, 3d Session.

MONDAY, MARCH 4, 1839.

VOL. 7....No. 15.

reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and last session we passed resolutions just as strong; and what did they amount to? To nothing. The British Government, instead of giving up their claims, had advanced the claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and threatened to support it with an armed force. Under these circumstances, he was for putting the country in a situation to meet the threatened contingency. He saw nothing alarming in the authorizing this volunteer force to be raised. They will be embodied only when the President shall call for them; and, being under his orders, they will not be able to march a foot until he commands it.

Mr. MERRICK was in favor of referring the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was an important measure, and should go through all the forms of legislation; and if it passed, it should be after full and solemn deliberation. There was no man in the country more reluctant to go to war than he was. A war would be highly injurious to the people he represented, but he would not sacrifice the honor or the interests of the nation for the sake of preserving peace. He had no fears of any consequences resulting from authorizing this volunteer corps. They are (he said) to be composed of the freemen of the United States, and upon them we can as safely rely for obeying the laws as for defending the liberties of the country. We are about to adjourn, and cannot meet again for many months. We are threatened with invasion, and the danger is great that the threat will be carried into execution. My opinion is that war will come before twelve months are over, do what you will. Ought we, then, to adjourn without putting it in the power of the President to defend the country?

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, even at this late hour of the night, considering the position which he occupied in relation to the subject, the Senate would excuse him for asking their attention for a few moments, whilst he replied to the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

For my own part, (said Mr. B.) I am not excited in the slightest degree, but am calm as a summer's morning; nor do I believe that the Senate required a caution against acting under violent impulse. I confess that, throughout the whole proceeding, I have been only anxious that we should act with such coolness, such dignity, and such discretion as would secure the approbation of the country. This important object has, I think, been accomplished. The justice of our cause is palpable; and I have only labored to prevent it from being obscured by the adoption of any measure, in the assertion of our rights, on which our constituents could be fairly divided in opinion. It was for this reason, that I came into conflict with the State of Maine in relation to the fourth resolution reported by the committee. Although I preferred that resolution as it originally stood, because it was more precise, yet the change in the last clause does not materially affect the meaning; and it has procured a unanimous vote in its favor—a consummation much to be desired. Should Maine act in accordance with the spirit of this resolution, then, if war must come, it will find the country unanimous. On the part of Great Britain, it will be a war of pure aggression, waged, during the pendency of peaceful negotiations, for the purpose of assuming exclusive military jurisdiction, against the clear understanding between the two Governments, over a territory to which she has not even a color of title. In such an event, the only alternative is war or national dishonor; and between these two, what American can hesitate? Force must be repelled by force; or national degradation is the inevitable consequence. I confess, however, it is still difficult to believe that Great Britain will madly rush into such a contest for an object so inconsiderable. This is a question for her own decision. All we have to do is to stand on the defensive, and exercise forbearance until the shock of arms shall render forbearance no longer a virtue.

I would ask the Senator from New Jersey what is there in this bill which is not precisely in conformity with the resolutions unanimously adopted last night? Which was the most important of all these resolutions? Was it not that one which declared that, if the British Government should, in pursuance of its avowed determination, attempt, by military force, to take possession of the disputed territory, that we would sustain the President in defending the rights of the country and repelling this invasion? This is the single principle clearly and strongly expressed in the fourth resolution. What, then, do we propose to do by this bill? Merely to carry out this principle in practice; and that, too, in the mildest form consistently with the safety of the country. Would we not make ourselves a ridiculous spectacle before all mankind, if we should adjourn, after adopting this solemn resolution, and leave the President without a dollar to defend the country in case it should be attacked? We first pledge ourselves, in the most solemn manner, to sustain him; and, when called upon to redeem our pledge, we prove recreant to this duty which, but yesterday, we imposed upon ourselves. Is there a single Senator here prepared to act such a part?

The bill is, in fact, but little more than a contingent appropriation of $10,000,000, placed at the disposal of the President, to enable him to call forth the militia in execution of the Constitution and the existing law, for the purpose of repelling the threatened invasion of the disputed territory. It is true that the term of service is extended from three to six months, and the President is authorized to accept of the services of volunteers. These are the only changes in the old law effected by the bill. It does not propose to add a soldier to the regular Army. Until the next meeting of Congress, it relies exclusively upon the present Army, militia and volunteers of the country, to repel the invasion of the disputed territory. Now, I ask, what less can we do, unless, regardless of our duty, we should determine to adjourn whilst war is impending over us, without providing any means of defense? And yet the Senator from New Jersey fancies that he sees in the bill a menace to England; and he dreads a rushing of armed citizen volunteers across our frontier for the purpose of invading the territory of a friendly Power. But what says the bill? Unless the contingency should happen for which it provides, these volunteers will remain at home. They can never be embodied without the orders of the President. They cannot move towards the frontier until the event shall occur on which we have solemnly declared that we will cordially coöperate with the President in defending the interest and honor of the country. What, then, is the inevitable consequence of the Senator's argument? That we shall adopt no precautionary measures to repel a threatened invasion lest, perchance, they may be construed into a menace by the invading Power! The gentleman has not seen the point to which his own argument would lead him. If he had, it never would have been advanced. Besides, this argument implies a want of confidence in our citizen volunteers, which I do not feel.

If we adjourn without passing this bill, we shall richly deserve the reputation of being a Government valiant in resolutions upon paper—a Government mighty in words, but contemptible in action. We should become the scorn of our constituents.

But this bill is called a threat. A threat! To prepare for war when an intention to invade our territory has been avowed, is a threat which may offend our powerful neighbor! Such was not the opinion of General Washington. He believed that to prepare for war was the best mode of preserving peace. Weakness always invites aggression. Fortunately, or unfortunately, for us, from the very nature of our institutions, we shall never be well prepared for war; but for this very reason, when we have cause to apprehend immediate danger, our exertions ought to be so much the more vigorous. We now find that Sir John Harvey is collecting and concentrating his forces, which it is said will amount to four or five thousand regular troops, with the avowed purpose of making a descent on the disputed territory, and placing it under the exclusive jurisdiction of England. When this danger is impending, shall we place ourselves in the contemptible position of resolving that the State of Maine shall be defended, and then reresolving that it shall not be defended, lest it might give offense to the British Government? We can never avert war by base submission; and if we could, the people of this country will never purchase peace at the price of self-degradation. No, sir; never. If the British Government should ever complain of this bill as a threat, our Minister can point with confidence to the letter and proclamation of Sir John Harvey, in which he has first threatened to take military possession of the disputed territory, under the express command of his sovereign. He can show that the menace first came from her Majesty's Government, and that our proceedings have been purely defensive. This bill contains no provision which goes further than adopting the necessary means of self-defense, in case a foreign foe should invade our native land. If my neighbor should be in the very act of attempting to deprive me of my property by force, and I should stand upon the defensive, he might, with the same propriety, turn about and accuse me of threatening him.

Whilst I am in favor of defending the just rights of Maine to the last extremity, I am also disposed to inform her distinctly, that if, in violation of the Constitution, which confers upon the Executive of the Union the treaty making power, and in violation of the clear subsisting understanding between the parties, she will become the aggressor, and attempt permanently to occupy the disputed territory by force, we are under no constitutional obligation to come to her aid, however difficult it might be even in such a case, to resist her appeal. In the language of the amendment made to the fourth resolution, it is her duty to leave the ultimate vindication of her rights to the General Government, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belongs. Hands off from this territory on both sides, while negotiations are pending. During this period, the question belongs exclusively to the General Government. It would be forever a source of regret, both to Maine herself and to the whole country, if she should not withdraw her forces from this territory, in case Sir John Harvey should set her the example, desisting from attempting its military occupation.

I deprecate war; but in a just cause I do not dread it. If it should come now, it will be inevitable, and we may appeal to the world for the justice of our cause. Our course has hitherto been correct in asserting our rights. I trust and believe that Maine will not embarrass us in pursuing it to the end. That she has cause to complain, I cheerfully admit; but let her continue to rely upon the General Government, and when the crisis shall arrive, if arrive it must, she will find the country as one man rushing to her rescue. On the contrary, should the patriotic, but excited, feeling which now seems to pervade her citizens, drive them into acts of aggression, and involve us in war, the best cause will be weakened by such conduct, and distraction and division among the citizens of the other States may be the consequence. Let her be prudent as well as firm. This controversy must soon be ended, either by negotiation or by arms. Let her patiently and patriotically await the result, unless the territory should be actually invaded.

The question was here taken on Mr. SOUTHARD's motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and lost without a division.

Mr. SOUTHARD then addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill, recapitulating the arguments used by him when first up.

Mr. WALKER said he did not rise at this late hour to make a speech in favor of this bill, but to appeal to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr.

SOUTHARD, and beseech him, by his love of country and regard for its honor and its rights, not to vote against this bill. It was not the bill that the Senator supposed it was. He certainly could not have had an opportunity of understanding it truly. He appealed to the Senator not to prevent a unanimous vote of this body in favor of a measure so essentially necessary for the honor and safety of the country. He fully believed that the Senator regarded the rights and liberties of his country as much as any man on that floor; and he had not a doubt but if he understood this bill properly, he would give it his support. Every vote given against this bill will be regarded by Great Britain as an invitation, on the part of the Senator who gave it, to persist in her unreasonable pretensions, and never to surrender her claims to this disputed territory. Not to pass this bill would be dishonorable, when we had declared that Great Britain had not a shadow of claim to this disputed territory, and that we would consider her taking possession of it as an invasion of the territory of the United States, that would justify the President, under the Constitution, in calling out the militia to repel it. When, in addition to this, we had pledged ourselves to the State of Maine to sustain her, would it not be dishonorable to vote down the only measure that would enable the President to carry into effect the recommendations of the Senate? If we should send a minister to England after this bill had been negotiated by the Senate, the British Ministry would laugh him to scorn.

And under what circumstances are we to refuse to pass this bill? From all the official information that is before us, we learn that the Governor of New Brunswick says that he is positively instructed by the British Government to take possession of this disputed territory, and that he is determined to do it with all the forces of the provincial Government, both regulars and militia. There is a threat, and not merely a threat, for it has been followed up by an actual call for militia, and by armed troops marching into the disputed territory. We shall disgrace ourselves by returning to our homes, and leaving a sister State undefended, when she has been threatened with invasion. Under these circumstances, he appealed to the love of country of the Senator from New Jersey—for he believed that patriotism beats in his bosom as strong as in that of any other Senator—to let the vote on this bill be a unanimous one by adding his voice in its favor, so that, when our Minister went to England, he might go armed with the strongest powers of the country. He knew that there were those within the sound of his voice who, armed with such a moral power as this bill, passed by the unanimous consent of both Houses of Congress, would give them, could not fail of bringing this controversy to a successful and happy termination.

Mr. NILES said he rejoiced to see this bill so perfectly acceptable to the members of this body, with but one solitary exception. We all agree in this matter, that we are for preserving the peace of the country if we can do so without sacrificing our honor. The only question, then, is, whether the assuming the attitude the bill proposes, by clothing the President with power to arm for defense only, on the one hand, and proposing to open a new negotiation on the other, the latter purpose will be frustrated by the former, as the Senator from New Jersey apprehends? Now, he had no such apprehensions. All the Senator's objections were, in his view, founded in error. No volunteers could be organized until the President called for them by his proclamation, and when they were organized they would be in the service of the United States; and no matter what the state of excitement on the Canada borders was, they could not march a foot without orders. But he would pass over this objection, as it could not be supported by any show of reason. The only plausible objection raised was, whether Great Britain might not consider the authorizing this volunteer force as some sort of a menace; as coming to her with the olive branch in one hand and the sword in the other? This was possible; but what would be the ultimate effect of assuming this attitude? It would produce this effect; it would convince the British Government that we are in earnest in this matter, and that, though we have a strong desire for peace, yet we are not willing to delay the settlement of these difficulties any longer, and that they must be settled at once or produce a rupture between the two countries. The high attitude we assumed towards France, notwithstanding her complaints of insult, settled the controversy with her that had lasted for a quarter of a century. Pass this bill, and the present controversy will be settled in twelve months. Instead of its being a war measure, I, for one, pronounce it to be a peace measure. It will preserve peace between the two countries. If you do not pass it, it will protract the negotiation, and perhaps end in a war which will last for years. He stood upon that noble maxim of the late President of the United States, that we desired nothing from foreign nations but what was right, and would submit to nothing that was wrong.

Mr. SOUTHARD here moved to strike out the provision in the bill for raising fifty thousand volunteers; which motion was rejected—yea 1, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Mr. Southard—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—38.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading; and it was carried by a unanimous vote—yeas 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—41.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed unanimously.

And the Senate adjourned at twenty minutes past four o'clock, a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 2, 1839.

On motion of Mr. NOYES, three other members were added to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The unfinished business of the morning being the report of the select committee on Virginia revolutionary claims,

Mr. HOPKINS moved a suspension of the rules for the morning hour to take up business on the Speaker's table, and allowing the committees to report; but, on a division, there being—ayes 35, noes 37—no quorum.

Mr. MALLORY moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in till a quorum appeared, when it was dispensed with, and Mr. HOPKINS withdrew his motion, and Mr. H. then asked leave to submit a resolution similar to that offered yesterday by Mr. GRAY, to pay the little boys, &c., $250 extra for the session. It being objected to, Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules; but it was ineffectual.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MERCER moved to suspend the rules till half past eleven o'clock, to enable the committees to report; which was agreed to—ayes 89, noes not counted.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a resolution discharging that committee from all its unfinished business.

Mr. C. moved that the annual report of imports and exports, which there had not been sufficient time to prepare, be printed during the recess, together with ten thousand extra copies; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERS, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House designate one member of the Committee of Claims, who is elected a member of the next Congress, whose duty it shall be during the recess to attend at the seat of Government and examine all petitions, memorials, and resolutions committed to that committee, and not acted upon at the present session, and to prepare reports thereon for the action of the Committee of Claims at the next session of Congress.

Mr. MERCER remarked that the member must be first sworn and qualified.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said it was doubtful whether the House had power to adopt such a resolution; and, therefore, he moved to lay it on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in relation to the removal of the surveyor general's office from Cincinnati; which was referred to the same Committee of the Whole having charge of the bill on that subject, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from all the unfinished business before them.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, without amendment, Senate bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana.

Mr. G. moved it be put on its engrossment.

Messrs. BRIGGS and FILLMORE insisted that it should be committed, as it involved an appropriation of money.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, explained the character of the claims, and urged the importance of acting upon them promptly, contending that it was not necessary to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole, which reference might prevent its being passed at this session. As objection had been made to its involving an appropriation, which was only $500, he would remove that difficulty by moving to strike it out.

Mr. FILLMORE. But it seems to appropriate indirectly a large quantity of land.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which motion, after some remarks from Mr. HARLAN, was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame De Lucy; and the amendment having been concurred in, the bill was committed.

He also, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Sebastian Butcher and the other heirs of Bartholomew Butcher.

Mr. CRABB, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Eslava.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to prepare a plan for the reorganization of the Indian department, and to report the same to this House at the next session of Congress.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of New Hampshire, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Samuel Whidden, and said petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

Also, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Gilbert Vroman.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which had been referred the message of the President of the United States of the 27th instant, relating to Mexico, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the unreasonable procrastination which has attended every step on the part of Mexico in the progress of the negotiations between the two Governments, for many years past, justifies a hope that the Minister who is about to be sent to that country by the President, will press for a speedy and definite settlement of the demands which have so repeatedly, but ineffectually, been made upon Mexico by the Government of the United States.

Resolved, That this House will impatiently expect the result of this mission; and if it shall prove unavailing, will sustain the executive branch of the Government in any ulterior measures which may become necessary.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution, which was concurred in, to discharge the committee from the further consideration of sundry memorials asking for the opening of international relations with Hayti.

Mr. CUSHING, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom have been referred sundry messages from the President of the United States in regard to the relations of the United States and Great Britain, report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the said messages, and documents accompanying the same, be laid on the table, and ten thousand extra copies of document Nos. 1810 and 183 be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. CONNOR, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the Nantucket Steamboat Company.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, on leave, without amendment, Senate bill to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of taking up the bill from the Senate in addition to the act to promote the progress of the useful arts; which was agreed to, the bill read twice, and committed.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with those whose territorial jurisdiction comprehends the Isthmus of Panama, and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of opening a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship channel or canal across the isthmus, and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations, on the payment of reasonable tolls.

Mr. M. also, from the select committee to which had been referred the bill to alter the mode of appointing certain officers of the United States, and for other purposes, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House of Representatives, as early as convenient after the commencement of the next session of Congress, a list of all the officers of the Government who derive their appointment from the nomination of the President and concurrence of the Senate who have been removed from office since the 3d of March, 1789, denoting in each list their number and grade, and the dates of their respective removals; also, a like list of the names of those officers whose terms of service being limited to four years were not re-nominated to the Senate at the expiration of their commissions.

Mr. HOWARD moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MERCER demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HOWARD called for the special order.

Mr. MERCER moved to suspend it for the purpose of acting on this resolution, and asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. HOWARD withdrew his motion.

The resolution was then agreed to; and

Mr. GRAVES called up the resolution submitted by him some time since, to inquire into the alleged defalcation of Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, late district attorney in Pennsylvania.

Objection was made; and Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules; which was agreed to.

Mr. KEIM said he earnestly hoped the resolution would be adopted. The friends of Mr. Ingersoll, as well as that gentleman himself, were, and always had been, exceedingly desirous that a full investigation into all his accounts and transactions with the Government should be gone into; and the more so as this was one of the proudest charges of his enemies.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD then renewed the demand for the special order; which was agreed to.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

The House then, in pursuance of the special order, went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the difficulties in Maine.

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. SALTONSTALL, who made an explanation of his remarks of last evening.

Mr. CUSHING then proceeded to discuss the merits of the question with reference to Sir John Harvey. Mr. C. was convinced that officer had misconstrued his instructions, and he adduced facts which went to show it. As to the bill, he denied that it was a war measure, either on its face or in its spirit. What were the preparations contemplated by it? Were they either aggressive or belligerent? They were not; they were purely defensive, and in conformity with the act of 1795. Instead, too, of being an augmentation of the Executive power, derived under that act, it was a diminution; because the law of 1795 gave the President general power, whereas the bill restricted it to a particular exigency—a contingency—on the arising of which he could act. Having explained and advocated the provisions of the bill, Mr. C. proceeded to defend the principles of the bill and the report, in reply to Mr. BIDDLE. As to the present being an incidental question, it was precisely one of those which the country could understand.

The main issue, the question of boundary, was involved in a tedious controversy, running through a long series of ponderous documents. Not so with this. It was a question of fact, plain and intelligible to every man. The State of Maine had been invaded, and that all could understand. Bring it home to the ordinary occurrences of life. A question of title to an estate might be so involved in intricacy, that no common man could unravel it; but if a trespasser fenced in half his neighbor's farm, it was plainly understood. Moreover, the case of the Aroostook was stronger than that of Madawaska. In regard to the latter, Great Britain had set up a claim of jurisdiction on the ground of uti possidetis. But they had never before set up to exercise practical jurisdiction in the Aroostook, for there the uti possidetis gave it clearly to the United States, and we had always held over it full sovereignty. Mr. C. produced a map, published by the House of Commons of England, and also cited the commission of the Earl of Durham as Governor General of all the British North American provinces, and which demonstrated that she herself then regarded the sovereignty over this territory as not belonging to her. After dwelling on the main points very briefly, Mr. C. concluded.

Mr. CRARY, after a brief review of the question, made an earnest defense of the bill, which he regarded as a peace or a war measure, just as it might be taken by Great Britain. As for the State of Maine, he knew the character of the people of this country too well to think, for a moment, that she would recede a single step; and rather than vote to coerce her to do so, he would abandon his seat and go home. He hoped the British Government would at once disavow the unlawful acts of her Provincial Governor; but if she did not, he was prepared for the worst consequences. Nor had he any of those terrors of her mighty power which some gentlemen seemed to entertain. Her relations with Russia, with Persia, with the Burmese Empire, and the East generally, were of the most critical character. The blood she had so cruelly shed in Canada, had weaned the heart of that Province from her, and her domestic relations were at this moment being shaken to their center. He did not desire war, but he would yield nothing to preserve a dishonorable peace. After some further remarks, Mr. C. concluded, and Mr. ADAMS followed at length in support of the bill, and on the question generally. He said he should not be surprised that, if the Congress failed to do anything at the present crisis, it might be taken as an argument by Great Britain that this Government had left Maine to its fate. She would answer "no" to all the claims of that State to have her rights of jurisdiction respected. Whatever might be the action of the House at the present time, he believed the question would eventually have to be settled by force of arms; and, for one, he was not disposed to have much further negotiation. It was for this reason that he was disposed to vote for this bill, as a further notification to the British Government—one which she could not misunderstand—as to what were our determinations. He was in favor of the bill, not merely because this contingency presented itself, but to put us in a state of defense for any contingency that might occur. He understood it as a bill to arm merely for the defense of our soil, and not as an indication that we were determined or expected to have war. England cannot understand it thus; there is nothing offensive in it at all. Every independent nation, whether weak or strong, has the right to arm herself up to the ears. The right to arm in self defense is a right of peace. Indeed, he was rather disposed to take a stiffer course than the bill proposes; for he did not altogether approve the section which proposes to send a special Minister to England; he thought she had assumed a wrong position, and should rather send us a special Minister to explain what, indeed, were her intentions.

The President and Secretary of State seemed to regret the course Maine has taken; but, so far as he was concerned, he respected and revered her for it; it was one sanctioned by the unanimous voice of her Legislature. The act of that State was deliberate, one of the qualities which belonged to firm and consistent action. The act was not rash and indiscreet, as denounced by some, but it was the exercise of her unquestionable right to defend her territory; and so far from disapproving, he would esteem her course, during the short remnant of his life, as honorable.

We had been so quiescent that the usurpations of England had now commenced to assume the form of rights. He wished to stop them where they are—send them back. That there should be no further mistake, no further delusion on the part of England as to what our rights are in this matter, he thought this bill should be passed. If, however, gentlemen would offer a substitute equally firm, equally argumentative, he would be willing to take it, not without.

Mr. LEGARE made a few remarks in reply to Mr. ADAMS, and was understood to intimate his approval of the resolutions which passed the Senate; and that he would not, on any account, vote this tremendous power, given in the bill, to the President, were he not of the opinion that he would use it with great prudence.

Mr. BELL regarded the former proceedings of Massachusetts or Maine, or of this Government, as of very little consequence to the present question; because, if Great Britain intended to assert her claim by arms, she would give us an intimation of that fact, or otherwise postpone it; and therefore we need not apprehend any violent collision till we have received information from that Government. Mr. B. did not think the bill in its present shape could pass the House, and some compromise must be come to. He could not bring himself to believe that anything like war would ensue. He had never questioned our right to the boundary claimed by us, and though he had anticipated difficulties, yet there was no issue of national honor now involved. All he thought the House ought now to do, was to express its concurrence in the views of the President, not by the passage of this bill, or the first section of it, but to grant him a sufficient supply of money to execute the powers already vested in him, in case the contingency provided for under the existing law of 1795 should arise. He had no objection to vote a contingent appropriation of $5,000,000, or more, and he had no great objection to the proposition to send a special messenger to England, if the Executive desired it.

Mr. HOWARD explained that the latter proposition was one emanating entirely from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, no member of which, he believed, knew whether it met the views of the Executive or not.

Mr. BELL was glad it came from the source it did. He then went on further to sustain his views of the non-expediency of action at present. They ought to do no more than declare their own opinion, or concurrence in the views of the Executive, and grant him sufficient supplies for any exigency that might arise, till dispatches were received from England and the new Congress could be called together. There was no necessity to go beyond this point.

Mr. EVERETT remarked that the only point of controversy was this: that the British threatened to take forcible and exclusive possession of the debatable territory, and this is what it is intended by this bill to prevent. But an agreement had been entered into that all further proceedings on both sides should be estopped; and after communicating that fact, by the President, there we should have stopped, for no further measures were required. They should not have permitted any serious difficulty to have grown out of an incidental question. There was no necessity for this bill; for, in any contingency, Maine would not be left defenseless, as the law of 1795 was in force, and authorized as much as the Executive could possibly do in sixty days.

At this stage, it being three o'clock, the House took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. EVANS addressed the House for a short time in explanation of some portion of his remarks made on Friday evening, which he admitted to have been too severe on an honorable gentleman [Mr. SALTONSTALL] for whom he cherished the highest possible personal respect. He then proceeded to express his entire conviction of the rectitude of that gentleman's motives, and acquitted him of the remotest purpose of strengthening the hands of a foreign Power against the interests of his own country and State.

Mr. ADAMS made a similar explanation in regard to Mr. BIDDLE, on whom he pronounced a short but beautiful eulogium. He insisted on his own right to combat the arguments of any other member with all the force in his power, and protested against its being interpreted as the slightest reflection against such member; and the strenuousness with which he had resisted the speech of Mr. B. was but a proof in how high a degree he appreciated the talents of that gentleman, and their effect upon the House.

The question being on the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, to amend the bill by inserting a provision for the purchase of a site for a foundery of cannon,

Mr. J. supported the motion in a short speech, and then, at the request of Mr. ROBERTSON, modified his motion so as to require that the piece of ground purchased should not be less than fifty nor over one hundred acres.

The question being then taken, the amendment was negatived.

Mr. WISE moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following as a substitute:

That the sum of $5,000,000 is hereby appropriated and placed at the disposal of the President to defray any expense which may be incurred by the employment of the naval and military forces of the United States, and such portion of the militia as he may deem necessary to be called into service, to repel or prevent any actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign Power, at any time before Congress can be convened to act upon the subject; to provide for which, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to cause to be issued certificates of stock, signed by the Register of the Treasury, for the sum to be borrowed, or any part thereof; and the same to be sold upon the best terms that may be offered after public notice for proposals for the same: Provided, That no engagement or contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed after the expiration of five years from the 1st of January next; and that the rate of interest shall not exceed five percent., payable semi-annually.

And be it further enacted, That the sum of $18,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for outfit and salary of a special minister to Great Britain: Provided, The President of the United States shall deem it expedient to appoint the same.

Mr. W. expressed his hope that the committee would be brought to a unanimous vote in favor of this amendment. It went to avoid all the disputed questions on the bill, and reduced it in fact to a contingent appropriation of $5,000,000. This was as far as he could go. The whole measure was, at last, but a menace; and, as such, it would, with such a power as Great Britain, operate rather as an obstacle to negotiation, than an auxiliary to its success. He was willing to vote a declaratory resolution like that he had offered; but he would not make the President a sole judge of the expediency of peace or war, &c. He was willing to trust the present Executive in a matter of that kind as far as he would any man, because he was not of a warlike disposition—but a chieftain might hereafter rise, and plead this act as a precedent. He believed the noise about war to be all humbug; but, if a war did ensue, he would not go as far as these resolutions went, but he would go further—he would ask President Van Buren for an office.

A Voice. What will it be?

Mr. WISE did not say; but observed that if this substitute should not be agreed to, he would then move resolutions generally similar to those which have been submitted to the Senate by a Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.]

The question being put, the amendment was negatived—ayes 73, noes 84.

Mr. WISE now moved to strike out the second section of the bill; which is as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign Power, or of imminent danger of such invasion, discovered, in his opinion to exist, before Congress can be convened to act upon the subject, the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, in addition to the present military establishment of the United States, to raise a provisional force, to be enlisted for five years, or during the continuance of hostilities with any foreign Power, not exceeding one regiment of dragoons, one regiment of artillery, two regiments of riflemen, and sixteen regiments of infantry, to be organized, in all respects, like the corresponding regiments now in service; and, also, to appoint not exceeding one major general, four brigadiers general, and not exceeding one surgeon and one assistant surgeon for each new regiment; the regiments, general, and medical officers, to be subject to the same laws and rules, and to be entitled to the same benefits, of every kind, with the like corps and officers now in service; and it shall be the duty of the President to discharge the troops which may be raised by virtue of this act whenever the occasion for them, as defined by this act, shall cease to exist.

After the reading of a substitute for that section, which Mr. McKAY was desirous of offering when in order,

The question was taken by tellers on Mr. WISE's motion to strike out, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 95, noes 78.

So the second section of the bill was ordered to be stricken out.

Mr. McKAY (chairman of the Military Committee) now moved to fill the blank occasioned by the above vote, by inserting the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the militia, when called into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, or of the act entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for these purposes," may, if in the opinion of the President of the United States the public interest require it, be compelled to serve for a term not exceeding six months after the arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year, unless sooner discharged.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign Power, or of imminent danger of such invasion discovered, in his opinion, to exist before Congress can be convened to act upon the subject, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, if he deem the same expedient, to accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding fifty thousand, in the manner provided for in an act entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen," approved May 23, 1836.

A member moved to extend the term of militia service to twelve months instead of six; but it was negatived.

The question on Mr. McKAY's amendment was then divided; and being put first on so much as relates to the term of militia service, it was carried—ayes 105, noes not counted.

The question being then put on the residue of the amendment, relating to volunteers,

Mr. WISE opposed it as going, in substance, to reenact the second section, which had just been stricken out.

Mr. McKAY denied this, and spoke a short time in vindication of the amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the amendment by limiting the number of volunteers to twelve thousand; which was rejected.

The amendment was then agreed to—ayes 101.

So the House adopted both branches of the amendment moved by Mr. McKAY.

Mr. WISE offered an amendment limiting the operation of the bill to thirty days after the commencement of the next session of Congress; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD moved to fill the blank which related to the number of millions which the President was empowered to borrow to carry into effect the purposes of this act, by inserting "ten."

Another member (not known by the reporter in the confusion which prevailed) moved "twenty."

Mr. WISE moved "five."

The question being put first on the highest number, "twenty," was negatived.

And the blank was filled with the word "ten"—ayes 95, noes 64.

Mr. FILLMORE moved the following amendment:

And to build, purchase, or charter, arm, equip, and man, such vessels and steamboats on the northern lakes and rivers whose waters communicate with the United States and Great Britain, as he shall deem necessary to protect the United States from invasion from that quarter.

Mr. FILLMORE warmly advocated the adoption of the amendment, and showed to the House the defenseless condition of the frontier.

The question having been put,

Mr. BRONSON called for a count, and rose amid loud cries of "question" and "order;" and, order being in some measure restored, Mr. B. said that gentlemen might cry "question" as loud as they pleased, but he should not be deterred from explaining and insisting upon this amendment; and he would stand in his place and insist upon a hearing to the last day, if necessary to insure a hearing upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN declared Mr. B. to be in order; and order being restored in the Hall,

Mr. BRONSON proceeded to say that the amendment which had been offered by his colleague [Mr. FILLMORE] was of the utmost importance to the northern frontier; and that without it the bill would be defective and partial.

Mr. B. said that, by the third section of the bill, the President was authorized, in case of invasion or imminent danger of hostilities, to fit out and arm the whole naval force of the United States; and, by that means, the bill provided, in the event of that contingency, for the protection of the Atlantic coast, and of our trade on the ocean, as far as the whole naval force of the United States was adequate to such protection; but it must be borne in mind that the United States had no vessels of any description on the northern lakes or rivers which could be fitted out, or put in commission—not a single vessel—not even a gunboat, did the United States own on those waters, as he believed, which could be used or made serviceable; and yet, in the event of hostilities occurring which are intended to be provided for by this bill, those northern lakes and rivers would be the principal theater of hostilities; and it would be by means of naval forces on those lakes that the country could not only be severely annoyed, but the frontier devastated. Hostile operations along the whole of that frontier must and would be principally on the lakes; and Mr. B. insisted that, if the bill undertook to provide for putting our vessels of war in a state of preparation and repairs, in case of the contingency mentioned in the bill, it was equally important that the President should be authorized to purchase or charter such vessels as might be obtained on those waters, and which might be readily put in commission and made serviceable for the defense of the country.

Mr. B. said that, as the third section now stood without this amendment, it provided, so far as we were able, for the defense of the whole Atlantic coast; but no provision whatever, not the least, was made for the northern frontier. It was partial and unjust in this respect; and, though he trusted and believed that no contingency would happen rendering any portion of this section necessary, yet if any provision was to be made, let it be general and impartial, and such as will operate for the benefit of the northern frontier, as well as the Atlantic coast.

Mr. B. said he had not risen to make a speech upon this subject, and would not detain the committee; he had merely wished, in the shortest time and fewest words possible, to explain to the House the nature and propriety of the amendment offered by his colleague, [Mr. FILLMORE;] and having done so, he trusted it would now be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

An amendment empowering the President to arm all the fortifications was moved by some member not ascertained by the reporter, and negatived.

Mr. McKAY now moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of either of the contingencies provided for in the first and third sections of this act, the President of the United States shall be authorized to apply a part not exceeding $1,000,000 of the appropriation made in this act to repairing or arming fortifications along the sea-board and frontier.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, whenever militia or volunteers are called into the service of the United States, they shall have the organization of the Army of the United States, and shall receive the same pay and allowances.

These sections were both agreed to.

Mr. PRATT offered an amendment for the construction of three steam frigates.

Mr. P. said he could not let this opportunity pass without saying a few words in support of this amendment. He would much prefer giving a silent vote, if he could do it, and perform his duty to his country. He was for peace, and had no doubt it was the wish of his country, if it could be preserved on honorable terms. But whether for peace or war, it was due to the people that the country should be put in a state of defense. It is our duty, as the representatives of the people and guardians of their rights, to see that the country be prepared to meet and repel invasion. He did not know that such a thing was likely to take place, but we should make ready for the worst. We should, like prudent men, prepare for war; and for that purpose, we should place all necessary means at the disposal of those at the head of the Government. As times do look a little squally, and as prudence dictated to us preparation, he would suggest, as the best mode of defense, the building of the three steam vessels in the shortest possible time. He said that the nations of Europe, with whom, in all probability, we would come in contact, are an age in advance of us as to the mode of warfare; they are keeping pace with the improvement of the age, whilst we are holding on to old systems. The whole mode of warfare will be changed in a few years, and we should be preparing for that change. He referred to the facility with which Europe could send her steamships and batter down our defenseless cities. He referred to the improved condition of the navy of England, which has in commission and now building fifty-three steam vessels, twelve of them ships of war; France has thirty-seven, and twenty-two of which are actually in commission; and Russia has eight, all in commission. He would not say more, but hoped the House would adopt the amendment.

Mr. PICKENS warmly remonstrated against thus incurring the bill with amendments, and declared, if it were persisted in, he should feel himself obliged to vote against the bill so amended.

The amendment proposed by Mr. PRATT was rejected.

Several other ineffectual attempts were made to amend the bill; when,

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the committee rose, and reported the bill to the House.

In the House, the bill being taken up, Mr. HOWARD proposed to concur in all the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole; but a division of the question being insisted on, it was put on the several amendments separatim.

The question on concurring in the amendment striking out the second section of the bill (above recited) was taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beers, Beime, Bell, Biddle, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, William C. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clark, Coles, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, Davies, Deberry, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland, James Graham, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Lewis, Lincoln, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Sampson Mason, Martin, Maxwell, McKay, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Calvary Morris, Murray, Noble, Ogle, Palmer, Pearce, Peck, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Putnam, Rariden, Randolph, Reily, Rencher, Ridgway, Rumsey, Russell, Saltonstall, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Southgate, Stuart, Stone, Straton, Taliaferro, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Towns, Wagener, Webster, Albert S. White, John White, Whitlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, Yell, and Yorke—136.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Beatty, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Cray, Cushing, Cushman, De Graff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Evans, Gallup, Gray, Harrison, Hoffman, Holt, Howard, William H. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Kennedy, Legare, Leadbetter, Robert McClellan, Miller, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Plumer, Pratt, Rives, Robinson, Sergeant, Shepler, Smith, Spencer, Taylor, Thompson, Toland, Toucey, Turney, and Vail—56.

So the amendment was concurred in, and the second section of the bill stricken out.

The section extending militia service to six months was agreed to without a count.

That empowering the President to accept the services of fifty thousand volunteers having been read,

Mr. MALLORY moved to reduce the number to twenty thousand; which motion was negatived—yeas 78, noes 105.

[On this question Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, demanded the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them.]

The number standing at fifty thousand, the section was concurred in—yeas 153, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beers, Beime, Bicknell, Birdsall, Borden, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clark, Coles, Connor, Cray, Curtis, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Ewing, Farrington, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Halsted, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Hastings, Hawkins, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Loomis, Mallory, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Plumer, Pope, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Rumsey, Sawyer, Sergeant, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shepler, Smith, Southgate, Spence, Stuart, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Albert S. White, Whitlesey, Sherrard Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—153.

NAYS—Messrs. Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Davies, Deberry, Everett, Rice Garland, Griffin, Hall, Hawes, Jabez Jackson, Legare, Lewis, Marvin, Sampson Mason, Maxwell, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Peck, Pickens, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Robertson, Russell, Saltonstall, Shields, Slade, Straton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, John White, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—47.

The remaining amendments of the committee having all been concurred in,

Mr. GRANT demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the House—yeas 103.

The previous question being then put,

Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them.

And the previous question was agreed to, (cutting off all further amendment.)

The main question then recurring, on the engrossment of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 201, nays 6, namely: Messrs. CRANSTON, DAVIES, GIDDINGS, MAXWELL, STRATTON, and WISE.

The bill was thereupon read a third time, (by its title), passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. ADAMS moved that when the House adjourn, (the Senate concurring,) both Houses meet to-morrow (Sunday) at ten o'clock, a. m.

He said that this was far better than continuing to sit, as the House otherwise would, till eight or nine o'clock. If it was a breach of the Sabbath, it would be as great in the one case as in the other, and the business would be half done, in the night, instead of being done understandingly and properly, after necessary rest.

Mr. CROCKETT demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and being taken, stood—yeas 89, nays 91.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. SHIELDS made a strenuous effort to get up the Tennessee land bill, (to issue warrants and grant titles for certain unoccupied lands in that State.)

Objections being made, he moved to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were taken, and resulted—yeas 90, nays 61.

There not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to consider the Senate's amendments to the appropriation bills still pending, namely, to the Navy bill, the civil list bill, the Army bill, and the Indian bill.

Mr. McKENNAN moved to amend the motion by adding the Cumberland road bill, and asked the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved the previous question on Mr. McKENNAN's motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. INGHAM in the chair) at first pronounced this out of order.

Mr. ELMORE appealed, and the House got into very great confusion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore subsequently reviewed the decision and reversed it.

The call for the previous question was seconded by the House—yeas 67, noes 60.

The previous question was then put and carried, (cutting off Mr. McKENNAN's amendment,) and the main question being on going into committee, it was carried; and the House thereupon went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair,) and took up the Senate's amendments to the

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MERCER addressed the House in vindication of Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones from the charges preferred against him when this bill was in the House. He quoted Mr. INGHAM's speech, and then sent to the Clerk's table a letter from Captain Jones, which was read.

The amendments of the Senate were all concurred in.

The committee next considered the amendments to the

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. BOND moved to disagree to the Senate's amendment proposing to strike out the clause of the bill which requires the public printing for the Executive Departments to be done on proposals, and let out to the lowest bidder; and he spoke with earnestness against the existing practice of giving that printing at extravagant prices as a job to favorites, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG ridiculed the idea of issuing proposals for every separate piece of printing which the Departments might need done.

The amendment of the Senate was negatived.

The committee also concurred in an amendment appropriating $6,000 for the salary of a resident minister at Constantinople in place of a chargé, as at present.

Another amendment of the Senate struck out the appropriation of five or six thousand dollars to comply with the contract of the Government with M. St. Clair Clarke and Peter Force, for the publication of their Documentary History of the United States, and the item for distributing copies of that work to members not supplied therewith.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House non-concur in this amendment. There was a contract; the books were published, and must be paid for. They lay rotting in the Secretary of State's office, and ought to be distributed.

The motion prevailed. So the House refused to concur in striking out this item of the bill.

The committee next proceeded to consider the amendments to the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

There were three sections added to the bill by the Senate—one to pay for lost horses of the Louisiana volunteers; one to allow the claims of the State of New Hampshire for the pay of militia; and a third respecting similar claims of Massachusetts.

[What action was had upon them the reporter was unable to hear, the noise and movement in the House being very great. His impression is, they were disagreed to.]

Another amendment had been made by the Senate, inserting the substance of the fortification bill, appropriating sums of money to complete various forts.

These amendments were concurred in; but not until a very warm debate had taken place on expending $10,000 on the fort at the Pea Patch below Philadelphia, pending a suit by a private individual who claimed the island on which that fortification stood as his own property. Messrs. RENCHER and RANDOLPH opposing, and Mr. NAYLOR advocating the appropriation, it was agreed to—yeas 95.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill, which had been returned to the House by the Senate, with an amendment providing for the repairs of various fortifications on the Atlantic coast,

Mr. GRANT submitted an amendment to the Senate's amendment, providing for the repairs of certain fortifications and military works on the northern and western frontier.

Mr. BRONSON remarked that he found, on examining the Senate's amendment to this bill, that the Senate had taken a bill which had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, making appropriations for the forts on the Atlantic coast, and had appended it to this bill as an amendment; that this amendment to the Senate only provided for the forts on the seaboard, and made no provision whatever for any forts or military work on any part of the inland frontier of the Union.

Mr. B. said he had endeavored to get the floor to offer an amendment providing for the repairs of the forts and military works on the northern frontier, and he was glad that his colleague [Mr. GRANT] had brought forward this amendment, which he deemed not only perfectly in order, but highly necessary and just. Mr. B. said he did not understand why it was that the whole of the northern and western frontier was neglected or left out by the Senate. If it was necessary to repair the forts and military works on the Atlantic coast, it was equally necessary to repair those on the northern frontier; and he protested against these partial and one-sided appropriations which went to benefit and protect one section of the Union to the exclusion of another; that bills had been reported by the Military Committee of this House providing for the repair and building forts on the inland frontiers, which it would be as proper to append to this bill, if in order, as the one which the Senate had added; and that, in reference to the repair of the forts or military works on the northern frontier, now actually occupied by our troops, such repairs were necessary and imperiously required by every consideration of prudence and economy.

Mr. B. said he had already, in some remarks which he had the honor to submit a few days ago, called the attention of this House to the defenseless state of the whole northern frontier, so far as any proper and sufficient forts and other works of that nature were calculated to afford defense or protection, and that sound policy would require the erection of some new works as well as the repair of old ones; and if it was now in order, he would submit (if he supposed it would be of any service) an amendment to provide for the erection of certain new works. At all events, under the amendment now under consideration, it is, beyond all doubt, competent to provide by further amendment for the repairs of the present works on the northern and western frontier; and it should be borne in mind that the amendments now offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANT] were appropriations which had been recommended by the War Department, and had undergone the investigation of the Military Committee of this House, and that that committee had reported them to this House, as recommended by the Department, except that he believed that the committee had very much reduced the amount which was recommended by the Secretary of War. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the House would adopt the amendment offered by his colleague, and thus do justice, in part, at least, to that frontier.

The amendment was understood to be disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee now rose and reported the naval appropriation bill and the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill to the House, with the amendments of the committee.

In the House, the amendments to the naval bill were all concurred in.

The civil and diplomatic bill then coming up, Mr. BOND called for the yeas nays on concurring with the amendment striking out the item for doing the printing of the Departments under proposals.

Mr. HARLAN and Mr. SMITH opposed concurrence.

Mr. CAMBRELENG advocated it; and the question was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 90.

The House concurred in the committee's disagreement to striking out the item for Clarke and Force's Diplomatic History.

Mr. TILLINGHAST proposed a recess till ten o'clock in the morning; but it was rejected.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. ELMORE now moved the following vote of approbation of the course of the Speaker:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Hon. JAMES K. POSE, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations; and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

On this resolution a long and excited debate arose, in which Messrs. ELMORE, BELL, McKENNA, CURTIS, PRENTISS, WISE, and GRAY took part, and which was terminated by a demand by Mr. GRAY for the previous question. It was seconded by the House, and carried—yeas 92; nays 73.

The main question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 57.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then went again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The noise was great, the efforts of the Chairman to preserve order incessant, but in a great degree ineffectual; and it was difficult to tell what was and what was not done by the committee. The reporter made out the following motions:

Mr. MALLORY moved to concur in the appropriation for Fortress Monroe, (Old Point Comfort,) and made a speech in support of the motion; but it was negatived.

Mr. YELL moved an appropriation for Fort Smith, on the western frontier of Arkansas; but it was pronounced out of order, as inserting another bill into an appropriation bill, contrary to the rule which forbids that to be done.

Mr. GALLUP moved a similar appropriation for some work in New York; which shared a like fate.

Mr. EWING moved to strike out the amendment for the fortifications in Charleston harbor, and went into a speech of very great animation in support of the motion; in which he took occasion to retort with severity on Mr. ELMORE, who had always opposed the Cumberland road, and who, he contended, was bound by his own principles, equally to oppose the work in his own State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the appropriation for the pay of the visitors to West Point Academy.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPEELL, of Tennessee, moved to strike out the whole appropriation for the Military Academy.

The motion was not agreed to.

The committee then took up the section respecting the pay for lost horses of the Louisiana volunteers; which, after a desultory debate, was concurred in.

The section providing for the payment of the New Hampshire claims for militia services was debated by Messrs. CUSHMAN, ATIHERTON, REED, and SMITH, in favor, and by Messrs. THOMAS and CAMBRELENG against the allowance; when it was rejected—ayes 31.

The section respecting the Massachusetts claims for militia services came next in order.

Mr. LINCOLN went at length into a speech in support of concurrence; after which,

The committee, on motion of Mr. LINCOLN, rose and reported.

It being now half past three o'clock in the morning, a motion was made to adjourn, but negatived.

The Senate having insisted on its rejection of interest in the bill for the relief of the Springfield Manufacturing Company,

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved that the House insist on retaining it in the bill; which was lost.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, the bill was laid on the table.

The House concurred in the amendments to sundry private bills, and also in a joint resolution of the Senate to meet again at ten o'clock.

And then (a little before four o'clock on Sunday morning) adjourned, to meet again at ten o'clock.

IN SENATE.

SUNDAY, March 3, 1839.

Mr. PIERCE moved that his friend the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. CUTHBERT,] be permitted to record his vote in the Journal on the passage of the bill giving to the President of the United States additional powers for the defense of the United States, in certain cases, against invasion, and for other purposes, as he was absent from extreme indisposition when the vote was taken.

Mr. BENTON observed that if there was any one case in the world on which he would agree to dispense with this important rule, it would be this—in which the Senator was compelled, from extreme indisposition, to be absent when the vote was taken on an important question, on which every gentleman wished his vote to appear. But he deemed the rule of such vital importance, that it ought not to be departed from in any instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore was under the impression that, the rule being imperative, it could not be departed from without the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. PIERCE would not have made this motion, but from the peculiar circumstances of the case. An important bill to provide for the defense of the country had been brought in from the other House, and the question on its passage taken late at night, soon after the Senator from Georgia had been compelled, from extreme indisposition, after a protracted and exhausting session, to leave the Chamber. Under these circumstances, the Senator from Georgia wished his vote to appear on the Journal in favor of this bill.

Mr. BENTON observed that the very decision made by the Chair was given when he first came into the Senate by Mr. Gaillard, the then Presiding Officer, who was one of the most urbane gentlemen he ever knew. Mr. Gaillard declared that, if the rule was not adhered to, there would be no termination of the business of the Senate. If one gentleman was permitted to come in under certain circumstances, another gentleman would claim to come in under other circumstances, and there would be no knowing where it would end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore said the motion was already decided on.

Mr. RUGGLES asked leave to withdraw the memorial of Thomas Jefferson Smith, which he had presented some days since, for the reason that he had discovered that it contained language derogatory and personally offensive towards W. A. Whitehead, another memorialist on the same subject, whose memorial had been withdrawn for a similar reason by the Senator from Michigan. He observed that he certainly should not have presented it had he been aware of the indecorum in the language of the memorial, to which his attention had since been called.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented several joint resolutions of the Legislature of that State, which, on his motion, were ordered to be laid on the table and printed, it being at too late a period of the session to take any further order upon them.

IMPROVEMENTS IN FLORIDA.

An act for the improvement and survey of certain rivers, and the repairs of certain roads in Florida, was taken up; and Mr. ALLEN offered as an amendment a proposition for the United States to apply the proceeds of their stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal to the purchase of stock held by individuals, with the view to absorb the ownership of the stock; which was supported by Messrs. ALLEN, WALKER, BENTON, and CRITTENDEN, and opposed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, SMITH of Connecticut, and SEVIER, and was rejected—ayes 6, nays 23.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

SIXTH CENSUS.

The bill to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States was read the third time and passed.

IMPROVEMENTS IN WISCONSIN.

An act to authorize the construction of certain improvements in the Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, was taken up; and, after some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD, WALKER, CLAY of Alabama, NORVELL, BUCHANAN, and LYON, it was laid on the table.

BILLS PASSED.

A great number of bills from the House, the titles of which have been heretofore given, were read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE BUILDING.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had suspended the 16th joint rule, so as to permit the House to send to the Senate the bill making an appropriation for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department, and asking their concurrence therein; which was agreed to.

The bill was then taken up, carried through its several stages as in Committee of the Whole, and, by unanimous consent, read the third time, and passed.

MALE ORPHAN ASYLUM.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill to incorporate the Washington Male Orphan Asylum and Manual Labor School, in the city of Washington. This bill (he said) had passed in the course of the evening without exciting much attention in the Senate, and he himself assented to its passage, without being acquainted with its details. The truth was, he looked towards the seat of the Senator from Ohio, who he understood intended to oppose this bill, and not seeing him there, he supposed that his objections were removed. Since the passage of the bill, however, he had examined some of its details, and he was convinced that had they been understood, it could not have passed the Senate. It allowed this corporation to take charge of any unprotected orphan found in this city, and work him till twenty-one years of age, or bind him out to any other person. The bill also took the control of these orphans from the chancery court, and left them there without any remedy, wholly at the disposal of this corporation, whether well treated or not—a thing unheard of in the legislation of any civilized country. He did not use too harsh a term when he said, that this bill authorized the corporation to catch every unprotected orphan in the District, and hold them in servitude. The bill was degrading to this unfortunate class of persons, and was opposed to principles that had been deemed sacred for ages. By the laws of the country from which we have derived our jurisprudence, the care of these orphans is confided to one of their highest judicial tribunals; but this bill takes the orphan from the courts, and turns him over, without appeal, to an irresponsible corporation.

Mr. ALLEN thanked his friend from Alabama for calling the attention of the Senate to this subject. The principle of the bill was simply this: it was to incorporate a few citizens of the District to take charge of all the unfortunate orphan children found within its limits, and to work them till of age. The bill did not impose on the corporation the obligation of teaching these children trades, or, in fact, of teaching them anything at all. The whole of the unfortunate orphan children of this District who have no one to protect them are to be turned over to this corporation, to be worked as slaves till they are twenty-one years of age. And this was not all; this corporation was to have the power of transferring the services of these children to any one they pleased; and no court whatever would have the power of releasing them from servitude. He would undertake to say that, if the whole history of the civilized world was searched into, a parallel to this bill could not be found. It was odious for its injustice, odious for its cruelty, and odious for its rapacity; and the whole of this odious principle was covered up in a mass of words. It was very imposing, too, in its title, being called, or rather misnamed, an orphan asylum. If there was anything true on earth, it was that governments should be the protectors of the poor, the fatherless, and the needy; and here you propose to turn over the most unfortunate of these to a heartless corporation to be worked as slaves. Mr. A. contended that, though Congress, as the local Legislature of the District, had the guardianship of these orphans, it had no right to transfer them to a corporation. Nothing could be said to justify this bill.

Mr. WALL made a few remarks in defense of the bill, contending that it was not liable to the objections of the Senators from Ohio and Alabama, and went into a history of the rise and progress of the institution, which, he said, was founded in motives of benevolence.

After some remarks from Mr. CLAY, of Alabama,

The question was taken on the reconsideration; which was agreed to.

The bill was then laid on the table.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839. The amendments were—first, to strike out the provision that the printing of the Executive Departments should be done by contract; and the second was, striking out the provision for distributing copies of the Documentary History of the United States to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Senate insist, and that a conference with the House be asked; which was agreed to.

Numerous bills from the House were acted on; after which the Senate took a recess until six o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee of conference appointed to consider the disagreement of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the general appropriation bill, reported that the managers appointed to conduct the conference on the part of the Senate and the managers on the part of the House, had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses to adopt the following course: That the Senate should recede from so much of its amendment as provides for the manner of executing the printing for the Executive Departments, with an amendment providing that the printing shall be executed in the city of Washington; and that the Senate insist on so much of their amendment as relates to the distribution of the Clarke and Force papers to members of the Senate, leaving it in the power of the House to make the distribution to its own members, while any such distribution to members of the Senate is prohibited.

Mr. BENTON said he never would agree to this report, and he demanded the yeas and nays on concurring in it. This system of distributing books had grown up to an enormous abuse, indeed the most enormous abuse in our Government. He would oppose it to the last; and if the appropriation bill was lost in consequence, and the Government stopped, why let the responsibility rest on those who would incur the risk for the sake of securing to themselves three or four hundred dollars' worth of books.

Mr. WRIGHT asked that the questions on concurring with the recommendations of the committee of conference be taken separately; which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. TALLMADGE inquired whether the bill would be lost, in case neither of the two Houses would agree to recede from the ground taken by them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore answered that that question was not before the Senate; but it was obvious that if one House should insist on its amendments, and the other should insist on its disagreement, and no compromise could be effected, the bill would be lost.

Mr. TALLMADGE observed that if the House of Representatives saw fit to vote for a distribution of books to its members, he would be willing to let them take the responsibility, and settle the matter with their constituents. He would, therefore, vote for concurring with the recommendations of the committee of conference.

Mr. NORVELL said that if any principle was involved, it applied as well to the distribution to the members of the House as of the Senate. He should, therefore, vote against concurring in the report.

Mr. WALKER was for concurring with the committee. If that was not done, the result would be that the whole bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government would be lost. The Government, throughout all its departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, would be brought to a close; and that, too, at a period of all others the most unfortunate. Other Senators might think it would be less dangerous to lose this bill than to suffer members of the House to vote themselves a few books. He hoped the Senator from Michigan would reconsider his determination, and let the report of the committee be concurred in.

Mr. BENTON said that the consequence of the Senate adhering to the resolution it had taken on the subject of the distribution of these books, might be the loss of the bill now pending; and as that bill contained the appropriations necessary for keeping the Government in action, gentlemen were a great deal alarmed at the danger of the Government being stopped. Then on whom would the responsibility rest? It will rest on those who have personal interests in these books; and those members, therefore, who are to receive these books ought not to be permitted to vote on this question, in which they are personally interested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore here stated that the discussion was not in order; that, by the joint rules, when a committee of conference was asked for by one House, and assented to by the other, the report of the conferees, together with all the papers, should first be presented to the House that assented to the conference. Under this rule, therefore, the report and papers were sent by the Secretary to the House of Representatives.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the amendments to the general appropriation bill, and resolved that the bill do pass accordingly.

The question was then taken on concurring in that part of the recommendation of the committee of conference as relates to the printing of the Executive Departments, and carried.

The question then recurring on concurring in that part of the report which relates to the distribution of the Clarke and Force documents,

Mr. BENTON warmly opposed concurring in the agreement. He objected to it because it made a distinction between the two Houses—allowing a distribution of books to the members of the House, while it refused a distribution of books to the Senate. He objected to it because a distribution of books to either House was wrong in principle. Some gentlemen seemed to fear that if the Senate insisted on its amendment, the appropriation bill would be lost, and the wheels of Government stopped; but could they suppose there was any member of either House who would be willing to break up this Government for the sake of retaining his share of these books, which were not worth more than $330 at the price they cost the Government, and which, if sold to Mr. Templeman, or any other bookseller, would not bring the half or quarter of that sum. Now, he was determined, as far as it depended on him, to put it to the test whether any member of Congress would be willing to put an end to this Government for the sake of retaining $330 worth of these books.

Mr. B. here enlarged on the growing evils of this system of distributing books to members of Congress; and in illustration, alluded to the manner in which another proposition to distribute books had been run through the Senate last night. A resolution was offered by a Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] to distribute among the members two volumes relating to the land laws. He had given full notice of his opposition to this resolution, and his intention to oppose it when it came up for consideration. Yet, in the course of a fatiguing session of eighteen hours, he had been absent from his seat but a few moments, and in those few moments this distribution was galloped through. It was presented to the Senate while he (Mr. B.) was in his seat; objected to by him; then withdrawn; taken up in his absence, and hastily run through. This book-making concern was one of the most crying abuses in our system. There was no end to it; it ran round in a continued circle. In the first place, a sufficient number of books are ordered to supply the members of a Congress. At the ensuing session the new members are to be supplied; and this is easily done, and in the following manner: some of the members who had already received copies may sell them to Mr. Templeman, and he sells them at a small advance to the publishers, and they are furnished to the new members at Government price as new books, who, in their turn, sell them to Mr. Templeman, and the process goes on ad infinitum, so that the original fifteen hundred copies may supply fifteen thousand members, the Government, at every revolution of the circle, paying the full price. He hoped the Senate would insist on its amendment, and let the people of the country see what members of Congress were willing to break up the Government to hold on to the books they had voted to themselves.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he had never voted for a purchase or distribution of books in his life. He was opposed to the whole matter, and thought it a most serious abuse. He would not, however, incur the hazard of such serious embarrassment as would result to the Government from the loss of the appropriation bill. He would, therefore, vote for agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, and let the members of the House take the responsibility of voting books for themselves.

The question was then taken on agreeing with the report of the committee of conference, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Davis, Niles, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, and White—7.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Hon. WILLIAM R. KING having temporarily retired from the chair,

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to the Hon. WILLIAM R. KING, for his able, impartial, and dignified conduct as Presiding Officer of this body.

Mr. DAVIS heartily concurred in the resolution, and hoped that it would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. SOUTHARD hoped the word "unanimous" would be inserted in the resolution.

Several members were heard at the same time expressing the same wish.

Mr. TALLMADGE modified his resolution by inserting the word unanimous, and the resolution was then unanimously adopted.

MADISON PAPERS.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved that a joint resolution for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers, be taken up; which was agreed to, and the resolution was passed.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULE.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved that the 16th and 17th joint rules be suspended, so as to permit this resolution to be sent to the House for concurrence; which was also agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that, having completed the legislative business before them, the Senate was ready to adjourn.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, stating that they had passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress had completed the business before them, and were ready to adjourn, if he had no further communications to make.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the resolution was concurred in, and Mr. HUBBARD and Mr. FULTON were appointed on the part of the Senate.

MADISON PAPERS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had passed the joint resolution of the Senate for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

Mr. BENTON asked what resolution? He had been in his seat, with the exception of a few minutes, the whole day and the whole night, and he had not the least recollection of any resolution of the kind having passed, and this was the first intimation he had that any such resolution was before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN also said that he had no knowledge of any such resolution having passed, and he believed he was in the Chamber at the time of its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, stated that he was in the chair when the consideration of the resolution was called for by the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE.] The resolution was taken up, considered, and adopted, with all the forms that are usual on the passage of a resolution. He wished to know if the Senator from Missouri intended to impute any incorrectness of conduct to the Chair in the proceedings on the resolution.

Mr. BENTON. Not at all; not at all. He was out of his seat at the time, and knew nothing of what was done, or how it was done; he only knew it was quickly done. He was out of his seat but a few minutes; was invited out of it into a near room; was, in fact, invited out several times before he went; and was out but a few minutes. He knew nothing of what was done until since he came back. He certainly imputed no blame to the Senator from Mississippi; neither thought it or imputed it.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had looked at the resolution, and found that it contained the certificate of the Secretary, that it had passed. Without making any complaint as to the irregularity with which that resolution passed, he would only say, that if their Secretary, or the secretary of any other body, distributed books under a resolution thus passed, he would, so far as he (Mr. W.) was concerned, do it upon his responsibility.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, that as to the responsibility attending this resolution, he avowed himself willing to meet it there or before the country. He had called up the resolution, and it had been acted on at his instance. He acknowledged that advantage had been taken of time and circumstances; but the same advantage had been taken of him and others, in various instances. He did not pretend to be much of a Jackson man, but he was perfectly willing, as regarded his participation in this matter, to meet the responsibility.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress having finished the business before them, were ready to adjourn, provided he had no further communications to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and had received for answer that the President had no further communications to make to Congress, and requested them to wish to each member of the Senate a safe return to his family and his home.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. TALLMADGE hoped that the Senate would not adjourn until they had consummated the business before them; that they would disregard this message, which had been sprung upon them—and sprung upon them in an irregular manner, during the discussion of a pending question—and complete the business before them.

The question on adjournment was taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON said this resolution could not pass. It was in the power of any one member to stop it, and he should use every effort to do so. It was then after midnight—it was two o'clock—there is not a quorum of the Senate present; messages of adjournment have passed between the two Houses and with the President, and no act, save the adjournment, can be done except by unanimous consent, which hides and covers up irregularities. The resolution had better be dropped; it cannot be passed; it will not be passed. Mr. B. said it was now after two o'clock—half past two o'clock—and he moved that the Senate do now adjourn; and that the hour be entered on the Journal. It was now half past two o'clock on the 4th day of March, and the constitutional existence of the Senate was at an end. This was the fact, and he wanted it on the Journal.

Mr. TALLMADGE inquired if the motion to enter the hour on the Journal was in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore stated that by the rules, any member who moved an adjournment had the right to have the hour at which such motion was made entered on the Journal.

The entry was accordingly made on the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore said that before taking the question on adjournment, he would ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a few remarks. He regretted exceedingly that he had left his situation in the chair for a moment, as it had led most probably to unpleasant feelings. He had hoped that at this hour, when they were about to separate, nothing would have occurred to mar the harmony of the body, or interrupt the feelings of personal kindness so appropriate to the occasion. He had endeavored, while presiding over their deliberations, to which he had been called by the kindness of the Senate, to discharge his duties to the extent of his ability—faithfully, he believed; honestly he knew he had; and he regretted, regretted deeply, that anything should have occurred, during his temporary absence from the chair, to induce unpleasant feelings, and prevent a harmonious adjournment.

Mr. BENTON said that every word spoken by the President [Mr. KING] went into his heart, and found a resting place there. Like him, he wished a harmonious adjournment; like him, he wished all to separate with feelings of personal kindness; and for that very purpose he had moved the adjournment. It was the quiet and easy way to get rid of an unpleasant subject; to avoid a struggle which will lead to no results; for the resolution could not become a law. He wished to drop it as it was; and then there would be nothing to mar the kind feelings which prevailed, and which all would wish, with the President, to see preserved.

The question was then taken on the adjournment; and decided in the negative—yeas 6, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Hubbard, King, and Williams of Mississippi—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Fulton, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and White—12.

Mr. BENTON said it was now entered on the Journal that it was half past two o'clock in the morning, and no quorum—only eighteen members present; and he now made a motion which was addressed to the President himself. In doing so, he would cite the example of Mr. Macon, whom they all knew, and than whom no man was more scrupulous. Mr. Macon held that at twelve o'clock at night, on the 3d of March of the short session, his powers as a Senator ceased, and if the Senate was not willing to adjourn at that time, he went away. Now, Mr. President, (said Mr. B.) I believe that at this hour, half past two o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March, you have no authority here, and I have no right to address you. I, therefore, mean to make the question with you, whether, at this hour, you have power to act. The Chair has given notice that he is going to sign the resolution, and I object to it. It is the 4th of March, and no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore said it was a very common thing at the close of Congress to sit and do business after midnight on the 3d of March.

Mr. BENTON said he knew it was, but in such cases the fact was kept out of the Journal; all appeared there to have been done on the 3d of March. The Journal went on headed the 3d, and the approvals of the President bore date the 3d. But now this is not the case. The time is marked on the Journal; it is marked the morning of the 4th, and the whole proceeding will be invalid on its face.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore was of opinion that he could not sign the resolution when a quorum of the Senate was not present, and so stated to the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said, as there was no quorum present, he hoped the Senate would adjourn.

Several SENATORS said they hoped not; that a quorum would be soon present; and said that the Chair could dispatch the Sergeant-at-Arms after the absentees.

Mr. BENTON said they had no right to send the Sergeant-at-Arms after members; that all power over Senators was at an end.

The question was then taken on adjournment; and decided in the negative.

Mr. MERRICK then made a few remarks in relation to the passage of the resolution. He said he was in his seat in the Senate, but knew not of the passage of this resolution. In fact, he did not know that the resolution had been presented for the consideration of the Senate, until he was informed that it had passed. He was in favor of the object of the resolution, and would have voted for it, if he had been aware of its having been before the Senate.

Mr. WALKER said, in regard to the resolution, he had understood such a one was to be offered, and not having been offered, he had concluded that it had been abandoned. The first actual knowledge he had of the resolution being before the Senate was hearing its title pronounced by the voice of his colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] I did not know what it meant. He read the resolution. I heard him distinctly put the question; and the various questions that are usually put on the passage of a resolution were put as fully and as clearly as they generally are; and the question was carried as fairly, and the Senate was as full as it was when a majority of the acts passed by that body were carried.

Mr. ROANE said that he knew no more of the passage of that resolution than the child unborn. He must have been in the Chamber at the time, but he had never heard it called up, nor any question taken on it. With respect, however, to these Madison papers, he looked on them in a very different light from the trash that was so often published by Congress. He had received, this very evening, from a distinguished gentleman in Virginia, a letter asking information about them. It was a letter abounding with good sense, and placing a proper estimation on these papers. With this letter in his hand he went round to the seat of his friend from Missouri, and endeavored to soften his rigid resolution with regard to the distribution of books, so as to make the Madison papers an exception. He endeavored to put these papers in contrast with the trash that was put abroad under the sanction of Congress, which may, perhaps, form the materials for a spurious history of the country. He represented that these Madison papers had already been published, and that there would be an absurdity, after paying for them, to put them away in the garret, with the trash that has lumbered there among the cobwebs of time. The Senator from Missouri stated the terms on which he would agree to the distribution of this particular work, and that was to make a general distribution throughout the Union, and into every State; and he desired me to go to the Secretary's table, and get the clerk to make out a list of the general distribution of documents, and then he would support it. Mr. R. then descanted at length on the great value of the Madison papers; the importance that the information contained in them should be disseminated as widely as possible, and the absurdity of locking them up from the public view, after having paid for printing them. He did not consider the works of James Madison of the same nature with those publications with which it had been the custom of the two Houses to supply the members—and he hoped that the resolution of the Senator from Missouri with regard to distributing books, would not, like the rigid laws of the Medes and Persians, be applied to them.

"a custom

More honor'd in the breach, than the observance;"

Mr. BENTON said the reference of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROANE] to him was correct; he had refused to agree to a distribution of the Madison Papers to the members of Congress, but was willing to a general distribution, according to the general distribution of documents; and desired the Senator from Virginia to get that list from one of the clerks, and either omit the members of Congress, or require them to pay the cost. This general distribution would carry the work into every State—its Senate and House of Representatives—its executive office—its colleges and universities—to all the executive offices of the General Government—to the Library of Congress—to the offices of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and many others. It would distribute eleven or twelve hundred copies, and place them in every part of the Union, and in the best hands for preservation and for use. Gentlemen were debating as if the only alternatives were between an exclusive and gratuitous distribution of these papers to members of Congress, or a consignment of them to the worms in the garret, and an everlasting loss of them to mankind. This was rather wild. The distribution which he proposed would have saved them from the worms, would have given them to the whole Union, and to all mankind; it would have curtailed nobody but members of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore said that on further consideration, and consulting the rules, he was of opinion that it did not require a quorum to be present to authorize the signing of a bill or resolution. It was not properly an act of legislation, but merely a signing to be done by the Chair to authenticate the act. Holding this opinion, he would now proceed to sign the joint resolution.

Mr. BENTON said the signing could only be done in the presence of the Senate, and there was no Senate when there was no quorum. Every signing was a public act. The Presiding Officer gave audible notice of it; the Senate ceased to act; no Senator could speak; nothing could be done while the President was signing. Mr. B. was clearly of opinion that acts could only be signed when the Senate was formed and a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore then signed the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN said that the resolution could not now go to the President for his signature. There is no committee of the House of Representatives which is necessary to form the joint committee, to join the committee on the part of the Senate to carry it. The House of Representatives had adjourned and dispersed, and the two members who composed part of the joint committee to take bills to the President had ceased to exist as members of Congress. The body to which they belonged had ceased to exist. The resolution could not be carried; there was no authority existing which could carry it.

Mr. FOSTER said that he would carry it. He was a member on the part of the Senate of the joint committee, and he had once carried a bill to the President alone, but he had ascertained that he had made a mistake.

[Mr. FOSTER and Mr. MERRICK, the committee on the part of the Senate then left the Chamber with the joint resolution.]

Mr. BENTON said the impediments were not yet surmounted; there was a little difficulty to be encountered when the committee got back. He had the rules in his hand, and would read them at the proper time. It was now four o'clock on the morning of Monday, the 4th of March; the House of Representatives adjourned and gone, and no quorum here. There were obstacles ahead.

Mr. WHITE said he would state what he knew respecting the passage of this resolution. He had just come into the Senate Chamber when he heard the Senator occupying the chair [Mr. WILLIAMS] ask if a resolution should be taken up. If he gave it any particular designation it escaped my ear. The Presiding Officer put the question, and it was passed, several voices voting in the affirmative. Not knowing what it was, or what it contained, I asked for the reading of it, and it was handed to me. As there was no discussion on the subject, no division asked, and none taken, and consequently deeming the question an unimportant one, he voted neither aye nor no. He himself was opposed to the principle of distributing books among the members of Congress; but none of those whose lead he was accustomed to follow on this subject opposing this resolution, and on looking around and observing that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] was not in his seat, he thought it was an unimportant matter, and did not expect to hear anything more about it.

The committee who waited on the President for his signature to the joint resolution having arrived in the Senate Chamber,

Mr. BENTON rose to a point of order—to have things done in order. One of the most solemn acts of the two Houses is that of sending bills to the President to be signed; it has to be done in a prescribed form, and reported and recorded in a prescribed form. Upon this depend all the questions connected with the ten days' constitutional right of the President to retain a bill, his culpability if he does not return it, the prevention of the return by the adjournment of Congress, the efficacy of the bill as a law if not returned in time, unless prevented by an adjournment. All this makes the presentation of the bill to the President one of the most formal and serious acts of legislation; and therefore the rules had carefully provided to make the presentation a matter of record in each House of Congress—a record the verity of which could not be impeached, and which would require no extensive evidence to support it. A standing committee was to carry it; that committee was to be joint; it was to be composed of two members from each House, and these two members of each House were to make report to their Houses, respectively, that the bill had been presented, carefully stating the day on which it was presented; and then this report was to be entered on the Journals of each House.

[Mr. B. here read the rules, to show that he stated them correctly.]

He said these rules could not have been complied with in this case. The joint standing committee was dissolved by the dissolution of the House of Representatives. The half committee of the Senate was a nonentity without the other half from the House of Representatives. No record could be made in the House of Representatives, which had been adjourned for two hours, and no such record can be made here, as the rules imperatively require. I call the attention of the Secretary of the Senate to the rules, in the entry which he is to make. The Senators will report what they have done; and that is, they went, without the committee of the House, to the President, and went on the 4th of March; and there ends the work for which we have been kept here so many hours. It drops now, as I proposed it should drop three hours ago.

Mr. MERRICK reported that within the last hour the committee had placed in the hands of the President a joint resolution for the distribution, in part, of the Madison Papers.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved that the Senate adjourn sine die.

Mr. BENTON asked if a minority of the Senate could adjourn sine die. He thought they could only adjourn from day to day, until a quorum was present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore decided that the Senate could adjourn sine die, and

The Senate adjourned sine die at twenty minutes past four o'clock, a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, March 3, 1839.

The SPEAKER laid before the House several Executive communications, which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

POST OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. LINCOLN asked the House to take up the bill to provide for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped they would confine this day to the needful appropriation bills; and therefore he must object to it.

Mr. LINCOLN thereupon moved a suspension of the rules; and the vote being—ayes 71, noes 38,

Mr. CAMBRELENG withdrew his objection.

Mr. CRABB then objected; but, on a second trial, the vote being—ayes 89, noes 29; no quorum,

Mr. CRABB called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused; and tellers being ordered, the result was announced—ayes 93, noes 35.

So the rules were suspended; and the bill was put on its third reading.

Mr. CRABB was opposed to acting on anything on such a day as this but what was absolutely necessary to carry on the Government. This was not a measure of that class, and therefore he opposed it.

Mr. TALIAFERRO opposed the bill mainly on account of the report upon which it was based.

Mr. CAMBRELENG demanded the previous question; which was seconded.

Mr. CRABB moved to lay the bill on the table; which was lost.

The main question was then ordered; and thereon

Mr. CRABB demanded the yeas and nays; but they were refused; and the bill was ordered to a third reading, and then read the third time and passed.

Mr. LINCOLN then submitted a resolution to suspend the 16th joint rule, so as to send this bill to the Senate; which was agreed to.

FLORIDA WAR.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.

Mr. EVERETT moved to non-concur in the amendment striking out the item of $5,000 for holding a treaty with the Seminoles.

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused.

The amendment then was non-concurred in—ayes 51; noes not counted.

The other amendment was concurred in.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The amendments of the Senate to this bill, upon which they insisted, namely: to have the executive printing and binding done upon advertised contract, and the one in relation to the Documentary History, were taken up.

Mr. BOND, at whose instance the first provision had been ingrafted upon the bill originally, briefly advocated its expediency, and moved that the House adhere.

The SPEAKER explained that this motion would peril the whole bill; and if both Houses adhere, the bill would be lost.

Mr. BOND was aware of the consequences, but he should persist in his motion nevertheless. Mr. McKENNAN did hope the gentleman would substitute the motion to "insist," and not peril the bill in this way.

After a few words from Messrs. ATHERTON, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, BRIGGS, GRENELL, HARLAN, WILLIAMS of Kentucky, GARLAND of Louisiana, FILLMORE, TILLINGHAST, RIVES, BANKS, and BELL, Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

After a number of suggestions from Messrs. RIVES, BELL, and others,

Mr. BOND substituted a motion to insist.

Mr. RIVES, as being more respectful to the other body, moved that the House "recede" from its disagreement to the proposed amendment of the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN said, as the executive printing had been a monopoly for years, he hoped the professed anti-monopolists, the Locofocos, would now show the sincerity of their professions by their votes.

The question being then taken, the result was—yeas 80, nays 93.

So the House refusing to recede, the question recurred upon the motion to insist.

Mr. LOOMIS moved to amend the motion by adding the words "and ask a committee of conference;" but the amendment was disagreed to.

The motion to insist was then carried without a division.

The other amendment, upon which the Senate had, in part, insisted, in relation to the Documentary History, was then taken up.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House insist.

Mr. TOUCEY moved that the House recede from its disagreement.

Mr. ATHERTON called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered; and Mr. TOUCEY's motion was rejected—yeas sixty-six, noes not counted.

The motion to insist was then agreed to without a division.

At a subsequent stage, the bill was returned from the Senate, accompanied by a message, stating that they still insisted, and asked a committee of conference, having appointed a committee of three on their part.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to concur in the resolution for a conference, which was agreed to; and, on his motion, a committee of three was appointed on the part of the House, consisting of Mr. BOND of Ohio, Mr. ATHERTON of New Hampshire, and Mr. LYCOLN of Massachusetts.

About seven o'clock at night, Mr. BOND made a report from the committee of conference, which recommended the Senate, in part, to recede, and in part to insist, upon their amendment, with the addition that the printing shall be executed in the city of Washington; and recommended that the Senate recede from part of their amendment striking out the appropriation for the Documentary History, but only so far as the House was concerned, the Senate abstaining from taking the books.

The report was concurred in without a division; but, at a subsequent stage, at the instance of Mr. BELL,

Mr. BOND moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the last matter was agreed to; and, after a desultory discussion by Messrs. BOND, LINCOLN, and BELL,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said that, rather than peril a bill upon which the temporary existence of the Government depended, upon a mere point of etiquette, he should demand the previous question; and it was seconded, carried, and the main question ordered and put; when the House refused to reconsider—yeas 54, noes 84.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair.)

Mr. McKENNAN moved to take up the Cumberland road bill.

The CHAIRMAN, however, ruled that the Committee must first dispose of the business under consideration when the committee last rose, which was the Army bill.

Mr. CASEY inquired if the Cumberland road was not necessarily in order, as the House had gone into committee generally?

The CHAIRMAN replied that it was not, and reiterated his decision.

Mr. McKENNAN appealed therefrom, but after some remarks from that gentleman and Messrs. CAMBRELENG, LINCOLN, and RARIDEN, he withdrew it.

The committee then resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, the question pending being on the provision to pay the State of Massachusetts $272,716 for her militia claims for services in the late war.

This was an amendment of the Senate, and the question was on concurring therein.

Mr. LINCOLN warmly advocated the claim, and went on to show that it was scarcely a seventh of what Massachusetts was justly entitled to, and that it precisely accorded in principle with the already paid claims of Connecticut, New York, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, and other States, proceeding to establish the latter point by a review of the services actually performed by the militia of Massachusetts.

Mr. COLES opposed the amendment. He objected to the manner in which it was introduced, by thus ingrafting substantive propositions upon bills with which they have no connection. It was a loose mode of legislation, ever to be deprecated, and was establishing a bad precedent. Moreover, the validity of the claim for so large an amount was not proven, and was doubtful. It had never yet been audited; and therefore the House would be voting away upwards of a quarter of a million of dollars in the dark. Mr. C. went into a variety of minute statements of the various items composing this gross sum, in order to show that the claim ought not to be passed. The evidence in support of a number of the items was deficient.

Mr. CAMBRELENG entreated gentlemen to abstain from speaking, for if they were to go into the merits of these ancient claims, they would have to sit all night again.

Mr. EVANS said the claim had been audited in 1836; and although then there was not sufficient evidence to establish all the items, yet since that time Congress had adopted a new principle of evidence, and upon the application of that principle this claim was valid.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"And that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle claims of the State of Maryland, for interest due on the amount of money advanced by that State to the United States during the last war with England."

This amendment was rejected without a division.

The amendment of the Senate was then non-concurred in—yeas 65, noes 73.

Some of the other amendments were agreed to, and others non-concurred in.

INDIAN ANNUITIES, ETC.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then took up the sundry amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill, some of which being concurred in,

Mr. EVERETT moved an additional item of $10,000 for surveying and marking the Indian country west of the Mississippi; which was agreed to.

Mr. BELL moved to amend the bill by adding a provision that the Cherokee warriors wounded, &c., in the late war with Great Britain, should be placed on the pension roll like other pensioners, which was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, remarked upon the large sums involved in the Senate's amendments, and inquired if they had undergone examination?

Mr. BELL said he had collated the sums with the requisitions of the treaties, and had found them accurate in every instance.

The amendments were generally, but briefly discussed by Messrs. PETRIKIN, HARLAN, CAMBRELENG, BELL, ADAMS, LEWIS, GARLAND of Louisiana, and EVERETT.

Some of the amendments were non-concurred in, but the more important ones were all agreed to.

The item of $5,000, for the commission to investigate the Creek frauds in Alabama, was discussed at length by Messrs. HARLAN, EVERETT, LEWIS, DAWSON, MURRAY, TOWNES, and GARLAND of Louisiana; when it was agreed to.

Before all the amendments were acted on, at the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the bill was laid aside, the committee rose, and reported the Army bill to the House.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair, the Army appropriation bill was taken up; and the House having concurred with the committee in their concurrence with the Senate's amendments,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to non-concur in the disagreement of the committee to the amendment for the payment for the Missouri horses, lost in the voyage from New Orleans to Tampa bay, which was agreed to; and thus the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The additional section for the payment of the New Hampshire militia was non-concurred in without a division.

The additional section also inserted by the Senate for the payment of the Massachusetts militia claims was taken up, on the question of concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement thereto.

Mr. LINCOLN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Before the call was commenced, the hour of three having arrived, the House took its daily recess until half past four.

EVENING SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, a resolution was adopted to give the little boys an extra compensation of $250 for their services during the last three months.

Sundry other resolutions of a similar character were offered; some of which were agreed to, and others rejected.

Mr. LYON moved that the House take up the bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company. He stated that he would not ask the favor, but, though he had been in the House all day, indisposition would compel him to leave the Hall.

Mr. LINCOLN objecting, Mr. LYON moved a suspension of the rules; but it was ineffectual.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question was then taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their non-concurrence with the Senate in the provision to the Army bill to appropriate $272,716 to liquidate the Massachusetts militia claims, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 63.

So the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. DOWNING asked leave of the House to present a communication from the Governor of Florida in relation to the barbarous murders recently perpetrated in that Territory. Mr. D. also asked leave to make a statement on the subject. He said it was very important, for the houses were in flames from the depredations of the Indians within ten miles of the seat of government.

Objection being made, Mr. D. moved a suspension of the rules.

The rules were not suspended—yeas 88, noes 54; not two thirds.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the payment of Indian annuities, and other Indian affairs.

Mr. DOWNING read an extract from a letter of the Governor of Florida, setting forth that the condition of that Territory was worse than it had been during any period of the war; and that the regular troops afforded no protection at all.

The amendment of the Senate providing for the Seneca treaty was non-concurred in.

Mr. EVERETT moved to non-concur in the section repealing the second section of the act of 1830, which authorizes the President to exchange lands owned by Indians east of the Mississippi, who wish to emigrate, for lands west of the Mississippi.

Mr. BELL fully concurred in the amendment, which would have the effect of preventing the multiplying of Indian treaties, and put an end to making these interminable Indian treaties.

Mr. EVERETT withdrew his objection, though he could not flatter himself that the amendment would arrest the evil.

The amendment was agreed to; and all the amendments of the Senate having been acted on, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved an additional clause to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers, not to exceed five thousand in number, for Florida, and that — dollars be appropriated therefor.

The CHAIRMAN, however, ruled the amendment out of order, on the ground that it was an appropriation for which there was no existing law.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then rose; and reported the above bill and amendments to the House.

The report of the committee on all the amendments was concurred in, and the bill sent to the Senate for concurrence.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. RARIDEN then moved that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Cumberland road bill; upon which motion

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were taken.

Before the vote was announced, Mr. DAWSON rose and called the attention of the House to the fact that names were recorded who were not in the city. Among these were Messrs. THOMPSON, WORTHINGTON, and MASON of Ohio; all of whom had left the city, and all voted in the affirmative. These votes, it was ascertained, if counted, would take up the bill; if omitted, the majority would be in the negative.

The SPEAKER suggested that the roll be called again, and the difficulty put an end to.

Mr. McKENNAN objected to this.

The vote was then announced—yeas 74, nays 77.

So the House refused to go into committee on the bill.

PEA PATCH ISLAND.

On motion of Mr. RENCHER, the House took up the joint resolution from the Senate to authorize the purchase of the Pea Patch Island in the Delaware river, and for other purposes, which, having been read twice, was committed; and Mr. R. moved that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union thereon; which was agreed to.

The House accordingly went into committee, (Mr. HOWARD in the chair,) and the above joint resolution was taken up and discussed by Messrs. MILLIGAN and HARLAN, when the latter gentleman moved so to amend it as to substitute the "President of the United States" for the "Secretary of War," and to limit the price to $50,000, subject to the approval of Congress.

After a few words from Mr. KEMBLE, the first amendment was disagreed to—yeas 51, nays not counted.

The second amendment was discussed by Messrs. HOFFMAN, POPE, MERCER, NAYLOR, McKAY, GRAVES, and CURTIS, when Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to limit the sum to $25,000.

This proposition was also discussed by the mover and Messrs. THOMAS, HARRISON, KEMBLE, PETRIKIN, GRAVES, CAMBRELENG, and BELL, when it was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS then moved to strike out $50,000, and leave the sum indefinite, subject to the ratification or approval of Congress; which was disagreed to—yeas 45, nays not counted.

Mr. HARLAN's amendment was then agreed to, without a division.

The resolution was then laid aside to be reported.

LAW OF PATENTS.

The committee then took up the Senate bill entitled "An act in addition to the act to promote the progress of the useful arts;" but, before much progress was made in it,

On motion of Mr. BELL, the committee rose, and reported the joint resolution, leaving the bill in committee.

The House concurred in the amendment to the joint resolution—yeas 83, nays not counted.

Mr. McKAY moved a further amendment; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN renewed his first amendment, but it was rejected without a division.

The resolution was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On the question of going into committee again on the bill on patents,

Mr. BOULDIN moved to include the bill providing for the building of a jail in the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS moved the Florida occupation bill; which was rejected.

Mr. BELL moved the bill to continue the Choctaw commission; which was rejected.

The House then went into committee, and resumed the consideration of the bill amendatory of the law organizing the Patent Office.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the provision for a board of examiners; which was rejected.

Several other amendments were submitted and rejected.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the enacting clause; and upon that motion, proceeded to state his objections to several provisions of the bill, then withdrawing the motion.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

JAIL IN WASHINGTON.

The committee then took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for the erection of a new jail in the city of Washington; and they being agreed to, the committee rose and reported the two foregoing bills to the House.

The first bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The House then concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill to provide for the construction of a new jail in the city of Washington.

SIXTH CENSUS.

The House concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill to provide for taking the sixth census.

ARMY BILL.

The House took up the Senate's amendments to the Army appropriation bill; and, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, concurred therein, the House receding therefrom.

INDIAN BILL.

The amendments of the Senate to this bill were taken up.

The House, in the morning, had disagreed to several of the amendments, but insisted upon one of them.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House now receded from their disagreement; and thus the bill was finally passed.

SELMA AND TENNESSEE RAILROAD.

Mr. LEWIS moved that the House go into committee upon several bills granting the right of way to certain railroad companies.

Mr. BELL moved to include the bill to continue the Choctaw commission; which Mr. LEWIS accepted as a modification of his motion; which was then agreed to, only so far as regards the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company.

The House then went into committee on various bills.

The bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company, granting them right of preemption to alternate sections, with six years credit, was taken up, and

Mr. LINCOLN was proceeding to oppose it; when

Mr. CASEY suggested that the gentleman move that the committee rise; for if this bill was to be debated, nothing more could be done.

Mr. LINCOLN accordingly made the motion, but held it suspended for suggestions, and then renewing it, the motion prevailed.

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAVES moved that the Tennessee land bill be taken up.

Objections were made all over the House, and Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 81, nays 49.

So the rules were not suspended, requiring two thirds.

COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the bill to change the times of holding the Federal courts in Louisiana was taken out of Committee of the Whole, brought into the House, and put on its third reading.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved an amendment in reference to the courts in New York; which was agreed to.

Mr. BRONSON moved a further amendment; which was agreed to.

The bill was then passed.

PEA PATCH ISLAND.

The amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution for the purchase of Pea Patch Island was concurred in by the House receding from so much of its amendment as the Senate disagreed to—yeas 109, nays not counted.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CUSHMAN offered the usual resolution for a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses were ready to adjourn.

Mr. WISE said he should object, for the House had not completed its business.

The resolution was agreed to without a division.

PAY OF SAILING MASTERS.

Mr. WISE moved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill to increase the pay of the sailing masters of the Navy. [Cries of "No!" "No!" intermingled with others of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The motion was disagreed to.

PAY TO A CLERK.

Mr. WISE asked leave to submit a resolution to pay the clerk of the select committee on defalcations certain extra compensation for his services.

Objection being made,

Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rules; and the tellers having announced—yeas 77, nays 45, (not two thirds,)

Mr. W. called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused; and the motion to suspend was rejected without a division.

Mr. S. W. MORRIS asked leave, as a member of the Committee of Accounts, to make a statement in relation to this matter; but it was refused.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the usual order was adopted, to send a message to the Senate notifying that body that the House, having concluded the business before it, was ready to adjourn.

EXTRA PAY TO CLERKS, ETC.

Several resolutions were offered again to give the clerks, messengers, stable-keeper, &c., extra pay; but they were all rejected.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

Mr. HARLAN moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to submit a resolution that the Secretary of the Treasury prepare a statement of the defaulters from 1829, and that it be printed during the recess.

Mr. H. asked for the yeas and nays on his motion; which being ordered, were—yeas 64, nays 33.

So the rules were not suspended.

MADISON PAPERS.

The House concurred in the resolution of the Senate to suspend the 16th and 17th joint rules of the House, so as to pass a joint resolution to provide for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

The joint resolution was soon after received, and, having been read twice,

Mr. WISE briefly supported it.

Mr. PETRIKIN was not opposed to the resolution, but he would take that occasion to remark that the charge brought by Mr. BELL against the Senate was now proven to be unfounded.

The resolution was then put on its third reading; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the resolution was passed without a division.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that, unless he had further communications to make, both Houses were ready to close the present session, reported that they had performed that duty, and were informed by the President that he had no further communication, but he wished the members all a safe and happy return to their homes.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. ELMORE moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Hon. JAMES K. POLK, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

Mr. McKENNAN inquired of the Chair whether this could be received at this time without suspending the rules of the House for that purpose?

Mr. ELMORE suggested that it had always been customary to offer a resolution of this kind as an act of courtesy, and it was never objected to.

Mr. BELL hoped that no objection would be made. It was an act of courtesy on the part of the House, to which he presumed there would be no objections of a technical character.

Mr. McKENNAN said he should not press the inquiry or make further objection.

Mr. CURTIS renewed the objection. This was not petition day, and petitions could only be presented on leave. The short time remaining ought to be devoted to the pressing business of the country, which ought not to be interrupted by a resolution of this description, which would, in all probability, lead to an excited debate.

Mr. ELMORE quoted from the Journal a precedent when a vote of thanks had been passed to Mr. Stevenson. The question of order had then been raised as now; the Chair decided the motion to be in order; an appeal was taken, and the House sustained the decision of the Chair by a vote of 95 to 40.

Mr. PRENTISS said he would not object to the offering of the resolution, but wished to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. ELMORE reminded him that it was a question of order, and that no amendment could be offered till that had been settled, and the resolution received.

Mr. WISE said he should never have raised the question of order himself, but thought it was very proper that it should be raised and considered; and as it was now up, he should back his friend from New York [Mr. CURTIS] in his objection. This was a resolution—nothing more, and nothing else—and it came under the rules which governed the presentation of resolutions. If it was in order, it could only be because the rules admitted its presentation, or because the House, by a vote of two thirds, suspended the rules for a time. The rules expressly forbade its being presented save on a particular day, and the rules had not been suspended.

Mr. CURTIS said that to avoid delay he would withdraw his question of order, though he held it to be a valid objection under the rules.

Mr. ELMORE said that, in offering this resolution, he had only followed out a practice of the House which had prevailed from the beginning of the Government. Courtesy had always dictated to the members of the House to accord to their Speaker that meet of thanks which was due to his services. He had no desire to wound the feelings of any gentleman; nor would he debate the propriety of the resolution itself; but if others entered into that question, he should claim an equal right to do so.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, said that he had come to the House prepared to expect the offering of such a resolution. He had seen indications of its coming, and he had come prepared also to offer an amendment to the resolution, and to sustain that amendment, which he should do, if left to sustain it alone.

Mr. P. said he was unwilling, at this hour, when they were about so shortly to leave that Hall, to allude to anything which might excite unpleasant reminiscences. He considered this resolution as not a mere matter of form. It had been claimed to be a mere act of parting courtesy, usual at the termination of every Congress; if it were that, and nothing more than that—if it were the mere touching of the cap or extending the hand to the Speaker who was retiring from office—Mr. P. would not oppose or object to it. He was for encouraging the courtesies of life, and they had seen quite enough, during the present session, to convince them of the necessity of doing so; but this was a peculiar case, to which the rules of mere courtesy did not apply. Mr. P. could not consent to praise the Speaker for having been impartial in the discharge of the duties of the Chair, simply because it was not true that he had been impartial. It might be said that this was a very small matter—a customary compliment merely; but as every gentleman knew, in politics a very small thing might become a very great thing; a mere thread might be seized upon, and, by party management, might be woven at last into a cable, by which to lead bodies of men and to control the Legislatures of States. The present resolution was one which presented facilities for being so availed of. Mr. P. had no objection to uttering a courteous farewell to the Speaker as a gentleman, and wishing him a pleasant journey home; but he believed this vote of thanks was to be used as so much political capital, to do political business upon, and he, for one, was not disposed to furnish it.

He said that the Speaker had not been impartial; the House did not so consider him; and in proof of this it would be sufficient to refer to the vote of the House refusing to him, on that very ground, the appointment of the members of an investigating committee, to examine into the defalcations of his own party. And though the debate on that subject had rushed and raged through the House like an unchained tiger, leaping in all directions, yet this was a point, and the only point, from which it had never departed; here it had fixed its fangs with a determined and a deadly hold. Trust the Speaker with that appointment the House would not; and now to pass a solemn vote that the Speaker had discharged his duties in an "impartial" manner would be to declare a lie. Mr. P. never would vote for such a declaration. He never would say what he did not believe, nor record the assertion that the Speaker had been impartial when the House had recorded its own vote to the contrary. Mr. P. had here in his pocket a little document, which would speak very intelligibly as to this Speaker's impartiality. He well knew what this resolution of thanks was worth, under existing circumstances. He should speak out plainly and explicitly, as he was wont to do. He knew that the incumbent of the chair was playing a political game, in which the smallest amount of capital was useful to him. In that game Mr. P. was opposed to him; and he would not, by voting for this resolution, throw it into his own teeth. He would not send that gentleman into the electioneering field with this certificate in his pocket; he would not certify to the people of the United States a positive lie, which was to be used against himself and others with whom he acted. He would say to the whole country that, in the formation of the committees of the House—and what act was of deeper importance—the Speaker had not been impartial. Mr. P. would not be understood as saying that it was unusual or improper that the Speaker of that House, in appointing its standing and other committees, should place upon them a majority of those who corresponded with him in political sentiment; of this he did not complain; but he believed there was not a legislative body upon the globe where, political parties being so nearly balanced, the disparity of those parties in the committees of that body was so enormous. Mr. P. would deal in no loose or general assertions on this subject; he would put his finger upon the facts—facts which, if the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELMORE] was able to swallow, his powers of deglutition must be very different from those of Mr. P.

To begin with the Committee on Foreign Affairs. How stood parties there? There were six Administration men to three of the Opposition. Was this—Mr. P. put it to gentlemen—was this a fair representation of the balance of parties in the House itself? Then there was the Committee of Ways and Means; every one admitted its importance as standing at the head of the finances; and how was it constituted? Here again it was six to three. But what was the constitution of the Committee of Elections? Everybody knew that a place on that committee had been no sinecure this Congress; so far from it, the acts and reports of that committee had shaken the pillars of this Government, as the blind Sampson shook the pillars of Dagon's temple; if they had not been absolutely thrown down, they had at least been shaken to their foundation. It was a committee in which, of all others, the strictest impartiality was demanded; for there it was that the demon of party was most likely to rear its hydra head. And how did this committee—a committee of judges—how did it stand? Seven to two. Yes, seven to two; and that was this Speaker's "impartiality!" Well, how stood the case with the Judiciary Committee? Here again it was seven to two, if the distinguished gentleman from Virginia was to be ranked with the Administration; but as a change had taken place since the constitution of the committee, it stood, on the most favorable statement, six to three. Here, then, under the action of this most impartial Speaker, the four most important committees of the House were so constituted as to give the Administration party, as its very smallest majority, two to one; and the most important of them all, on a political point of view, had seven on the one side, and but two on the other.

Mr. P. did not mean to be understood as derogating in the slightest degree from the character, or reflecting on the conduct, of the members of these committees; far from it. They acted, no doubt, according to their own views of public duty. He spoke only of the balance of political power in those committees collectively. But how stood matters in those committees which exerted no party or political influence? Oh! there he found quite a different state of things. The Committee on Manufactures contained eight Whigs to one Administration man. Now, if their duty had been to manufacture politics, did any man believe that such a proportion would have been observed? Oh, no; the balance would have been far different. Then there came the Committee on Roads and Canals—a committee which, however useful or important, exerted no political influence; and it contained seven Whigs. Here the proportion was seven to two. So in the Committee on Revision and Unfinished Business, seven to two. In the little Committees on Expenditures in the various Departments, it was still larger; some of these were all Whigs. Now, did not this show design? Was there not a reason for so great a contrast? It showed a deliberately-adopted principle of action, followed out through the whole selection; and this by a Speaker on whose own election to the chair the House had been so equally divided that his election had been carried by thirteen votes only out of two hundred and forty-seven. After this, could Mr. P. vote to declare that this officer had been "impartial" in exercising his great and most responsible power? This was in the appointment of committees; and then, as to other cases, where the House had been equally divided, and the casting vote of the Chair decided the question one way or the other, would any gentleman point him to a single instance, whether of greater or of minor importance—whether the decision swept away the whole political rights of a State, or recognized the official claims of the Globe newspaper, or settled the smallest question, where the vote had not invariably been given in one direction?

Mr. P. did not deny the capacity of the Speaker, his dispatch of business, or his full and thorough knowledge of parliamentary law—he conceded all this—but it was the facts he had just quoted on which M. P. took his stand, and denied, utterly, the "impartiality" of the Chair. And he never would, out of mere courtesy, indorse a tool of the Executive, or a tool of the party.

A more perfectly party Speaker, one who would be more disposed to bend the rules of the House to meet the purposes of his own side in politics, never had pressed the soft and ample cushions of that gorgeous chair. To say that he had been impartial in the duties of his high office would be but flattery; it would be certifying to what was not true; and Mr. P. had too often seen the effects of certificates not to be cautious how he gave them. He was willing to make the Speaker a courteous parting bow; but he would not consent to let him sit there and do all his party work and then march out with the honors of war. The duties of the Chair were too important for this. The presiding officer of that House cut out, in effect, all the business of the House. It was he who placed before it all the material work for its action, and decided who should work it up. Through the standing committees of that House, his power extended to the utmost bounds of the nation. It was, in some respects, beyond that of the President himself. Such an officer ought not to be the high priest of party—that Moloch, before whose altars were daily immolated the dearest rights of this Republic. *The present Speaker was, as the House well knew, a candidate at this time for the Chief Magistracy of his own State; and in the canvass there, and throughout all the West, this vote would be referred to as an undeniable proof that he had exercised the utmost impartiality while in that chair; and yet the House itself had utterly refused to trust him. When that damning fact should be brought by his opponents, what more would he have to do, should this resolve pass, than to tear from the records of the House the leaf which contained it, and, holding it up to the sun, pronounce all these representations to be unfounded calumnies? All those gentlemen who did conscientiously believe that the Speaker had been impartial would, of course, vote for the resolution; but Mr. P. called upon all who did not, and could not, in their hearts believe so, but who did believe that, with strong hand, he had wielded his power for the purposes of a party, to vote against it. Let those who knew the resolution to be untrue, say so by their acts. For, one, if Mr. P. had ever seen the poised needle turn and point with still prevailing attraction toward the pole, he had seen that Speaker turn with equal constancy towards the interests of his party. Gentlemen might raise the notes of their te Deum laudamus as high as they pleased; but he called upon all those whose free sentiments had been crushed on that floor by the weight of his official truncheon, to let the world see that they would not give the lie to those sentiments of indignation which had often been forced from their lips under the smart of oppression. Let them not give this unguarded, sweeping certificate of good behavior, to aid the election of the Governor of Tennessee. Thus to vote a public lie was to set a bad and pernicious example, particularly in a free Republic.*

Mr. P. concluded by moving as his amendment to the resolution, to strike out the word "impartially."

Mr. GRAY said he did not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution, but for the purpose, if the House should agree with him, of having immediate action upon it, that the House might proceed as speedily as possible to other business. He said it was his intention to move the previous question; but before he made that motion he would make a brief reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] who had not objected to the resolution on the ground that the Speaker had not with ability and impartiality presided over the deliberations of the House; but, on the contrary, the gentleman conceded that the Speaker had, with ability and impartiality, decided all questions which, by the rules and parliamentary law of the House, it had been his duty to decide. The whole ground of objection was, that the Speaker had appointed a majority of his political friends on the leading and most important committees of the House; and hence the Speaker had not been impartial. The gentleman said, strike out the word "impartially," and he would vote for the resolution.

Was it not the duty of the Speaker to appoint committees as the House would have done? Can any one doubt that the House would, by ballot, have elected committees precisely, or at least substantially, as the Speaker appointed them? Could an instance be given in which a committee had been elected, that the majority of the House had not placed a distinct majority of their political friends upon the committee? There is a case too recent to be forgotten by the House—the Swartwout committee. A majority of the House are opposed to the Independent Treasury, and supposed, perhaps, that if they could have a committee of opponents of that measure, arguments might be found against the measure; and what was the result? The committee was six and three—two to one against the Administration.

The resolution offered is not novel; it has been customary here, and is customary in all the State Legislatures. One was passed complimentary to Mr. Stevenson at the expiration of his term of service. He pursued the same course as the present Speaker in the appointment of committees; and, more recently, at the expiration of the term of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] a resolution in nearly if not the precise language with the one under consideration, was passed. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] who was then in favor of the Administration, followed the example of Mr. Stevenson in the appointment of committees.

Mr. G. said he had before him the Journals, and would read the appointment of committees made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] if any one desired it. The present Speaker has done the same, nothing more; and less he could not do, unless he entirely disregarded the will of the majority.

Mr. G. said his colleague [Mr. CURTIS] had raised a question of order upon the introduction of the resolution, and as he supposed his object was to defeat the resolution by preventing its consideration, Mr. G. said he would refer to an example in the New York Legislature, which his colleague would recollect. In 1838, the present Lieutenant Governor of that State was Speaker of the Assembly. During the session party spirit ran high; frequent collisions took place between the minority of the House and the Speaker; many appeals were taken from the Speaker's decision, and much asperity was exhibited in debate; and yet, at the close of the session, the minority joined in an expression of thanks to the Speaker. A distinguished individual of that minority, formerly a member of this House, [Mr. MANN,] as is usual on such occasions, rose above the party excitement that had prevailed, and made a speech highly complimentary to the Speaker; it was due to the Speaker and the honor of the State, that the minority should thus act; and should the same just spirit prevail here, what is due to the dignity of the House, to the Speaker, and to the honor of the nation would be done.

But another and more significant objection is raised; it is, that the adoption of this resolution may make him political capital; that it may be used in the Tennessee election "upon every stump in the State;" hence the gentleman from Mississippi would withhold from him the justice which, by parliamentary custom, is due to him, lest, by doing justice to him now, he may have justice done him hereafter in his own State. Mr. G. said it was not a matter that ought to be discussed; the facts in the case were upon record, and known to the House; the propriety of the resolution was self-evident; and if gentlemen wished to make a party question of it, and show the country that they carried party feelings to an unprecedented and unwarrantable extent, the sooner they declare it the better.

Mr. G. then moved the previous question.

The previous question having been moved upon the resolution, it was seconded; and upon the motion shall the main question be put, which was upon the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Cray, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Elmore, Farrington, Fry, Gallup, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, William H. A motion was made by Mr. CONNOR that the House adjourn without day, when

The SPEAKER rose, and addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives: In taking leave of this body, in all probability forever, emotions are excited which no language can adequately convey. When I look back to the period when I first took my seat in this House, and then look around me for those who were at that time my associates here, I find but few, very few, remaining. But five members who were here with me fourteen years ago, continue to be members of this body. My service here has been constant and laborious. I can, perhaps, say what but few others, if any, can—that I have not failed to attend the daily sittings of this House a single day since I have been a member of it, save on a single occasion, when prevented for a short time by indisposition. In my intercourse with the members of this body, when I occupied a place upon the floor, though occasionally engaged in debates upon interesting public questions, and of an exciting character, it is a source of unmingled gratification to me to recur to the fact that on no occasion was there the slightest personal or unpleasant collision with any of its members. Maintaining, and at all times expressing, my own opinions firmly, the same right was fully conceded to others. Our discussions were at that time conducted with that courtesy and decorum, and respect for the opinion of others, which ought ever to prevail in a deliberative assembly. For four years past the station I have occupied, and a sense of propriety, in the divided and unusually excited state of public opinion and feeling which has existed both in this House and in the country, have precluded me from participating in your debates. Other duties were assigned me.

The high office of Speaker, to which it has been twice the pleasure of this House to elevate me, has been at all times one of labor and high responsibility. Its difficult, and often delicate, duties have been fully appreciated and freely expressed by all my predecessors. They have all borne testimony to the difficulty, nay, impossibility, of discharging its duties with entire satisfaction to all, especially in seasons of high political or party excitement. Whilst they have borne this testimony, I think I may truly affirm that none of them have had a severer ordeal to pass than has fallen to my lot. Frequent have been the occasions when, but for the indulgent and liberal support at all times given to me by this House, I should have been utterly unable to preserve that order and decorum which should ever attend the deliberations of the representatives of the people. It has been made my duty to decide more questions of parliamentary law and of order, many of them of a complex and difficult character, arising often in the midst of high excitement, in the course of our proceedings, than had been decided, it is believed, by all my predecessors, from the foundation of this Government. This House has uniformly sustained me, without distinction of the political parties of which it has been composed. Our records will show, that upon the numerous appeals which have been taken to the House, I have been sustained by both political parties, and often by decided and large majorities. Though doubtless I may often have fallen into error in promptly deciding novel questions, suddenly raised, I trust it was not on points material, and I know it was never intended. I return to this House my thanks for their constant support in the discharge of the arduous and difficult duties I have had to perform.

But, gentlemen, my acknowledgments are especially due to the majority of this House for the high and flattering evidence they have given me of their approbation of my conduct as the presiding officer of the House, by the resolution you have been pleased to pass. I regard this as the highest and most valued testimonial I have ever received from this House, because I know that the circumstances under which it has passed has made it matter of substance, and not of mere form. I regard it as of infinitely more value than if it had been the common matter-of-course and customary resolution, which, in the courtesy usually prevailing between the presiding officer and the members of any deliberate assembly, is always passed at the close of their deliberations. That is unmeaning—is indiscriminately conferred—is a mere act of courtesy, and possesses, comparatively, but little value. I return to the majority of this House, what I sincerely feel, my grateful thanks for this high evidence of their approbation and regard, given, as it has been, at a time of high party excitement, which, in the accomplishment of party and political objects, but too often disregards all other considerations. I shall bear it in grateful remembrance to the latest hour of my life.

I trust this high office may in future times be filled, as doubtless it will be, by abler men. It cannot, I know, be filled by any one who will devote himself with more zeal and untiring industry to do his whole duty than I have done.

We are now about to separate, many of us never again to meet. I wish you, gentlemen, a safe return to your families and friends; and whatever our respective future destinies may be, my prayer to a beneficent and overruling Providence is, that our future lives may be useful and happy.

The SPEAKER then announced that the House stood adjourned without day.

The House (at two o'clock, a. m.) adjourned sine die.

Report of the Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, }
November 28, 1838. }

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the following report upon the several branches of the public service confided to the superintendence of the War Department.

The provisions of Congress for the increase and organization of the army have been carried into execution, as far as the limited time since the passage of the act, and the circumstances of the country, would permit. The eighth regiment of infantry, authorized by law, has been raised, officered, and equipped for the field, as have four additional companies of artillery. The staff of the army has been completed in every department, according to the intentions of Congress, and will form a most efficient branch of the service. In execution of the law of March 2, 1821, which says "That each regiment of artillery shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant, and nine companies, one of which shall be designated 'and equipped as light artillery,'" I have caused one company of artillery to be mounted, and armed with their appropriate arm. It is very desirable that the intentions of this provision of the law, which have been so long postponed, should be carried into effect without further delay; and I would recommend that this description of force, so important in the composition of an army, and so efficient in the field, be increased by separating two companies from each regiment of artillery, and forming with them two battalions of light artillery, one to be stationed in the western, and the other in the eastern division of the army.

The only additional increase of the army attending this arrangement, which is calculated to add very considerably to its effective strength, will be that of the field officers of the battalions.

The army has been actively and usefully employed, as will be seen from the report of the Commanding General, partly on the southwestern and northern frontiers, and partly in the Cherokee country. With a view to render it more efficient, I would recommend that the places and manner of quartering and stationing the troops in time of peace be changed. Scattered in small detachments and distant posts, it would be impracticable to unite any part of it in sufficient strength to make an effective resistance upon any one point of either frontier; and equally so to impart to them that discipline and skill in military maneuvers which they will have to practice in time of war, and which will enable them to meet an enemy in the field on equal terms. The object of our fortresses is to defend our harbors, and to arrest the first progress of an enemy's arms; and this may be effected by small garrisons of regular troops, aided by a well-trained militia. Our militia, covered by works and fortifications, have proved themselves, from their dexterity in firing, to be superior to the best European troops; but it cannot stand against them in the field, from its want of instruction and military organization. If, therefore, the army is to remain shut up in fortresses, and militia to be depended upon to march to their relief, in case of invasion, we fail to avail ourselves of the advantages that may be derived from the different qualities of these troops. In the present state of the art of war, no fortress is impregnable, and each in its turn would be forced to yield, if attacked, unless there was an army ready to march to its relief; for the militia, although perfectly competent to defend the forts, would be found incapable of contending with disciplined troops in the field, or of storming an intrenched camp. My object would be, therefore, so to station the troops, that they should form a center around which the militia may rally, and the combined forces march to the relief of any point that may be menaced or attacked. The points which appear to me best calculated for such stations as are here indicated, are, in the State of New York, on Lake Champlain, whence troops may be moved with facility towards the northern or eastern frontier, and to protect the sea-board. In Pennsylvania, at Carlisle, where exist already good barracks, and from whence troops may be moved rapidly upon any point of the coast north of the Chesapeake. In the State of South Carolina or Georgia, not far from the head waters of the Savannah river, a commanding position may be occupied, from whence troops might be transported to any point between the Chesapeake and Florida, with nearly equal expedition. The fourth station I would recommend is Jefferson barracks, a central post as regards the southwestern frontier, Louisiana, and all the western States; presenting extensive lines of water communication, which greatly facilitate the movements of the troops upon any point of the western division. These stations, supplied with a competent regular force, and, when the occasion requires it, augmented by the hardy militia collected from the neighboring States, would be able to contend successfully with any force that could be sent against this country; whilst small garrisons of regulars, aided by the volunteers and militia of the maritime and inland frontiers, might occupy the forts and defend them until the corps d'armée nearest the point attacked could march to their relief. In no other way can an extensive line of frontier, like that of the United States, be defended by a small army such as ours. To carry this measure into effect, it will be necessary to ask of Congress an appropriation for the purpose of erecting and extending the accommodations for the troops at the points indicated.

The sparse population of the western frontier and the number, character, and proximity of the enemy we have to guard against in that quarter, will require that the garrisons of the several posts should be stronger than on the maritime or northern and eastern frontiers; and it is respectfully recommended that the measures proposed by the Department for the defense of that frontier, the last year, should be persisted in. It is to be regretted that those measures were not sanctioned by Congress at its last session. The law of the 2d July, 1836, is in progress of execution, and every exertion has been made to meet the wishes of the framers of it. The survey of the whole line of road has been made, and part of it under contract.

I should not, however, discharge my duty as the officer charged with this branch of the public service, if I refrained from reiterating my opinion, that the plan proposed by that law would not only be inefficient, but, if carried out to its full extent, would produce immediate hostilities with the Indian tribes on that frontier. So confident am I that the withdrawal of the garrison from Fort Gibson would be the signal of an outbreak on the part of the Indians, that I have ventured to suspend the execution of that part of the law until an opportunity could be given to Congress to reconsider that order; and would respectfully suggest that the position of the posts, the direction of the lines of communication, and all the details relating to the defenses of the frontiers, should be left to that department of the Government which is responsible for the peace and defense of the country. I will briefly recapitulate the plan of defense proposed by me, in order to bring it again to the notice of Congress, with an expression of my conviction that, if adopted, it will prove effectual for the protection of the settlement on that frontier, and will impose such a restraint upon the Indians as to keep them quiet and peaceable, as well as to enable the authorities of the United States fully to comply with their treaty stipulations with those tribes, and protect them against intrusion from the whites.

I propose that the existing fortresses within the Indian territory should be enlarged and strengthened, and others erected at the Illinois river, near the line of the State of Arkansas; at Table creek, near the Missouri river, below the Platte; and at the upper forks of the Des Moines; these stations to be connected by good roads, perpendicular to the line of defense, and connecting it with an interior line of posts to be established at convenient points, to serve as places of refuge for the inhabitants in periods of alarm or danger, where they could remain in safety until relieved by the regular troops. This, with some additional depots of arms at points judiciously selected, and a good organization of the neighboring militia, would furnish ample security and protection to the bordering States. The works on the exterior line, especially, should be built of permanent materials, and in a manner to insure the health and comfort of the soldier, and to be defended by a small garrison.

In order to maintain these remote posts at the least possible expense, as well as to secure permanent and seasonable supplies, I would recommend that a farm be attached to each of them, to be worked by a given number of laborers, under a competent superintendent, with the assistance of the soldiers at seed-time and harvest. For this purpose it will be necessary to have the authority of Congress to hire the necessary number of laborers, it having been found by experience that the constant employment of soldiers in the cultivation of the soil is incompatible with discipline or the acquisition of military skill. They may, however, be made very useful at particular seasons of the year, without any detriment to the service.

I have seen no reason to change my views as to the proper organization of a militia or volunteer force, to serve as auxiliaries to the system proposed for the defense of the maritime and inland frontiers. It would, doubtless, be desirable to adopt some uniform system of organization, which would render effective the whole militia of the United States; but no plan has yet been suggested that can be carried into effect throughout the whole of our extensive country. That which appears to present the greatest advantages, and has been frequently pressed upon the attention of Congress by my predecessors in office, appears to me to be only applicable to the thickly-settled portions of our country; for if it were attempted to divide the militia into classes in some parts of our southern country and on our borders, where their services are most likely to be required, it would be found difficult to assemble a single company of the junior class within a space of one hundred miles. It is to be feared that the whole militia of the United States will be found too unwieldy a body to be successfully organized at once by any plan that can be devised; and for some time to come it had better be left to the direction of the several States, adopting only a uniform armament and uniform drill, until a system be introduced on the frontiers which may be gradually extended over the whole country. A commencement may be made by enrolling twenty thousand men, taken from among the inhabitants and settlers of the frontier and the country around the permanent stations in the interior. Six consecutive days in the year would be sufficient for their drill, provided the commissioned and non-commissioned officers be assembled for instruction at the nearest military post for the term of thirty days in the year. During the time the privates and officers are in service, they should receive the pay and rations of soldiers and officers of the army of the same grade respectively. These forces would not be withdrawn from the States where they are raised, and may be called into service by the Governors, upon the requisition of the President. In this manner would be formed a well-disciplined body of militia, capable of acting as an auxiliary force both to the regulars stationed in the four posts above designated, and to the garrisons stationed in the maritime and frontier fortresses, and a system commenced, which, if it work well, may gradually be extended so as to embrace the whole militia of the United States.

A considerable portion of the troops have been employed in Florida under that indefatigable and zealous officer, General Taylor. Engaged in a harassing service during the sickly season of that unhealthy climate, they have displayed a spirit of enduring courage and perseverance highly creditable to the American soldier. The theater of this war is a country of dense forests, swamps, and morasses; the enemy active, subtle, cruel, and invisible; and the mode of warfare one of pursuit, by following the track of an unseen foe. It is, in short, a contest entirely devoid of all the incentives which usually repay the soldier for the toils, privations, and dangers to which his duty exposes him. But the Government has no alternative. The Indians must be expelled from Florida, and the army will make any sacrifice that is required to protect the inhabitants of that Territory from these ruthless savages, and to maintain, untarnished, the honor of their arms. During the past summer, profiting by the unhealthiness of the season, the Indians made several incursions into the settlements, committing the most cruel murders, and, as is usual with them, sparing neither age nor sex. They attacked the light-houses, and murdered the crews of the vessels which were unfortunately driven on shore, and wrecked on that dangerous coast. The necessary protection due by the Government to the commerce of the country, and to the citizens of Florida, demands that the utmost exertions be made to drive these merciless savages from a country which they have so cruelly afflicted. No pains will be spared to effect this object, but it does not appear that the means hitherto adopted are calculated to do so. A vigorous effort was made last year with a formidable force of regular troops and mounted volunteers. Every scheme was tried that a skillful and vigilant commander could devise, and that brave and active soldiers could execute. The morasses were traversed; the forests and swamps penetrated in every direction; the Indians beaten whenever they could be overtaken, and many of them forced to surrender, who were afterwards sent out of the country; but still, as soon as the sickly season set in, it was found that some of these savages had eluded the vigilance of our troops, gained their rear, and penetrated into the heart of the settlements, where their presence was first discovered by the murders they committed and the barbarous cruelties they perpetrated upon the aged and helpless. They were enabled to effect their bloody purposes only by the unsettled state of the country through which they passed. When this war first broke out, the Indians destroyed all the frontier settlements, and the inhabitants beyond them in the interior abandoned their homes, and were either received into the service or supported at the expense of the Government. A valuable and fertile portion of the Territory became a wilderness, through which the Indians wandered like wild beasts seeking their prey. Had these people been compelled to remain; to picket their houses; to arm themselves, and form associations for the mutual protection of their firesides, we should have been spared the recital of Indian murders and devastations. This is what is now proposed to be done. General Taylor has been directed to invite the settlers to return to their homes; to receive them, when there, into the service; to cause them to surround their houses with stout pickets; to organize them into battalions for mutual defense; a part of them to be kept under arms, while others are employed in cultivating their farms. No doubt this arrangement will aid in protecting the country from the inroads of the savages; but the farms which will be so occupied will be too sparse to form an impenetrable barrier to the Indians; and it is respectfully recommended that a portion of land, selected by the officers of the Government, should be granted to such settlers as will bind themselves to settle on it, and to cultivate and defend it under such regulations as shall be made by the Executive.

That portion of the army employed in the very important and delicate operation of removing the Cherokees, has acted throughout with the activity and zeal which distinguish this branch of the public service. The generous and enlightened policy evinced in the measures adopted by Congress towards that people, during the last session, was ably and judiciously carried into effect by the General appointed to conduct their removal; and his orders were executed, both by the regular troops and the volunteers, in every instance, with promptness and praiseworthy humanity. The reluctance of the Indians to relinquish the land of their birth in the east, and remove to their new homes in the west, was entirely overcome by the judicious conduct of that officer, and they departed with alacrity under the guidance of their own chiefs. The arrangements for this purpose, made by General Scott, in compliance with his previous instructions, although somewhat costly to the Indians themselves, met the entire approbation of the Department, as it was deemed of the last importance that the Cherokees should remove to the west voluntarily, and that, on their arrival at the place of their ultimate destination, they should recur to the manner in which they had been treated with kind and grateful feelings. Humanity, no less than sound policy, dictated this course towards these children of the forest; and in carrying out, in this instance, with an unwavering hand, the measures resolved upon by the Government in the hope of preserving the Indians, and of maintaining the peace and tranquillity of the whites, it will always be gratifying to reflect that this has been effected, not only without violence, but with every proper regard for the feelings and interests of that people. The unprecedented drought which afflicted that part of the country during the past season compelled the General to postpone the period of departure of the Indians until very lately; but since they have been on their march, the most satisfactory intelligence has reached the Department of their progress, and of the good order with which, under the direction of their own chiefs, the parties are advancing towards their permanent homes.

The peaceful execution of the removal of the Cherokees has been interrupted by the treacherous conduct of a few warriors, who had fled to the mountains of North Carolina. A small party of Indians, while marching under escort to the rendezvous, took advantage of the kindness and humanity of our men, who had lent their horses to convey their children more conveniently, and murdered them while walking heedlessly by their side. The officer only escaped by the speed and activity of his horse. A detachment of troops has been sent in pursuit of the murderers, and from the character of the officer commanding it, no doubt is entertained that the fugitive Cherokees will be promptly arrested. This cruel and treacherous act is much to be lamented, and forms a strong contrast to the orderly conduct of the rest of the nation. The General commanding there represents the Cherokees as equally indignant with the whites, and anxious, themselves, to be allowed to march against their countrymen, and punish them for this wanton and cruel murder.

The Government, on its part, has taken every precautionary measure to comply fully with its treaty stipulations towards these Indians, and to render their new home comfortable and acceptable to them. As soon as a proper regard for the peace of that portion of the country, and the probability of the successful execution of the measures of Government would admit, a part of the troops were removed to the northern frontier, and stationed by the Commanding General of the Army in a manner to afford protection to that part of the country. It was hoped that the good sense and respect for the laws which characterize the American people, would have rendered unnecessary any coercive measures to restrain them from taking part in the disturbances of Lower Canada. But I regret to say that not only have the citizens of the United States, living on that frontier, aided the feeble efforts of the Canadians, which can terminate only in their misery and destruction, but others bordering on Upper Canada, where no disposition to revolt is known to exist, are banded together in secret societies for the express purpose of invading the province of a friendly Power, which, but for this unjustifiable interference, would remain in peace and tranquillity. The means used are as reprehensible as the end proposed is nefarious; and it is a subject of regret with this Department that it has not at its disposal a sufficient number of regular troops effectively to guard this extensive frontier from all attempts, on the part of our fellow-citizens, tending either to disturb the peace of Upper Canada, or to succor the insurgents in the lower province—attempts which can only lead to the discomfiture and death of the parties immediately engaged in their execution, and to the shame and sorrow of those who, by thoughtlessly encouraging these acts, have produced such fearful consequences.

In compliance with the expressed wish of Congress, the northern and northwestern frontiers have been reconnoitered by two able and experienced officers of engineers, and the result of their observations will be laid before Congress as soon as the report of the proceedings is received.

It will be seen, from the accompanying report of the Chief Engineer, that the delay attending the appropriation for the military and civil works under the superintendence of that department until the close of the last session of Congress, occasioned the temporary suspension of those works during a great part of the season for efficient operations.

By my direction, the Board of Engineers proceeded to examine the works of Fort Delaware. The purchase of the island on which the important work is situated, is again earnestly recommended to the attention of the Government.

The operations at Fort Monroe have been commenced, according to the intention of Congress, and will be prosecuted without interruption until the works are completed. Measures have been taken to obtain the title to the land on which this fort is situated, and to effect the purchase of the bridge connecting it with the main land, as authorized by Congress.

In compliance with the recommendation of the Board of Engineers, by whom an examination of Fort Calhoun was made in September, 1837, the mass of materials which had been heaped upon the foundation to produce a settlement, and afterwards removed, is in the course of being replaced. It is proposed now to postpone the erection of the superstructure until these foundations have attained their final subsidence.

The appropriation for Charleston harbor was intended exclusively for the protection of Sullivan's Island, and measures have been taken by the officer of engineers, under whose general superintendence it is, to apply the funds to that purpose. As soon as the services of an officer of experience can be made available, there will be one stationed permanently in this harbor.

By direction of this Department, several of the civil works, formerly under the superintendence of the military, have been transferred to the topographical engineers.

Since the last report, the great task of removing the raft in the Red river has been completed. The formation of a new raft, on the site of the old one, has been a serious inconvenience, but it is hoped the navigation will be reopened very soon after the commencement of the working season; the boats for this purpose have been already dispatched to the river. The formation of this new obstruction supports the views expressed in the last annual report, and shows the necessity of keeping a boat constantly at work upon the river for several seasons to come.

The detailed survey of the mouths of the Mississippi, referred to in the last report, is now nearly completed, and will be submitted, at an early day, to the Board of Engineers. Their plan of amelioration, if sanctioned by the Department, will then be carried into immediate execution.

On the Upper Mississippi the water has been so high as to prevent all work.

By the increase of the corps of engineers at the last session of Congress, the several works of the Department will soon be more immediately under the control of the Government officers; the change cannot, however, take place immediately, as, in conformity with my views, explained in my report of last year, an addition of five young officers only has as yet been made, and the remaining vacancies it is proposed to fill annually by selections from the highest graduates of the Military Academy.

The officer of engineers in charge of the Military Academy having applied to be relieved, Major Delafield, of the corps, has been ordered in his place.

The necessity of horses and instruction in the cavalry exercise, now that the cavalry has become a component arm of the service, is evident; and until regular provision for this purpose can be made by law, it is proposed to replace the artillery detachment, now there, by one of dragoon privates, which would procure for the cadets the use of the horses. I would urgently recommend that the instructor of artillery and the assistant professor of history, geography, and ethnics, be placed by law upon the same footing as other assistant professors at the academy. The French classes are very much in need of instructors, and none are known in the line of the army qualified for the task. I therefore recommend that authority be given to appoint two citizens, with moderate salaries, for that purpose.

The large building containing an exercise hall, recitation rooms, and quarters for unmarried officers, so long wanted at the academy, is finished, and now in use. Since the last report the building, containing the library, chemical laboratory, and philosophical and engineering rooms, has been destroyed by fire. The appropriation of the last session to replace this, would have been applied sooner, but before determining on sites for the new buildings it is proposed to adopt the suggestion of the Board of Visitors of 1837, viz: to appoint a board of competent engineers to determine, in conjunction with the superintendent, a general plan for the public buildings at the academy. Many of the present buildings are entirely unfit for the purposes to which they are applied, and must, eventually, come down; and the position of each new one authorized should have reference to the system of future construction.

While treating this subject, it becomes my duty to bring to your notice the dilapidated condition of one of the barracks. This building is literally worn out, and in so decayed and corrupted a state as seriously to endanger the safety and health of the cadets. Its removal and reconstruction will enter into the plan to be presented by the board for the arrangement of the public buildings at West Point. The system here suggested, of presenting, before any public works are commenced, a well-digested plan for such enlargements and improvements as the increase of our population and the future wants of the country may require, has been generally adopted and will be hereafter persevered in, so that the present constructions will all be erected in conformity with, and in furtherance of, a general plan. At the same time the Department has adopted regulations to govern the engineer's, quartermaster's, and ordnance departments in the construction of the buildings under their superintendence, so as to avoid all unnecessary extravagance, and at the same time secure solidity, uniformity, and durability.

For the more efficient and economical administration of the engineer department, in many respects the most important branch of the military service, I beg leave respectfully to suggest that an inspector of fortifications ought to be appointed, with such additional rank and emoluments as will insure respect to the officer of engineers who shall be selected to perform that duty, and defray the additional expenses which must necessarily be incurred during the extensive tours of duty he would be called upon to make. Experience has proved that this duty can only be discharged by an officer of this corps, and the important nature of the works, on the solidity and durability of which so much of the safety and honor of the country may depend, requires a vigilant and frequent inspection of them during the progress of their construction, and recommends this measure to the favorable consideration of the Legislature.

The ordinance corps has been increased agreeably to the provisions of the late law.

The operations of that branch of the service have been conducted with intelligence and activity, and some progress has been made in digesting a general system by which they will hereafter be regulated. A series of experiments have been ordered, which will determine the precise character of the field and heavy artillery, and it is then proposed to arm the artillery regiments, which have hitherto acted as infantry, when in the field, with their proper arm. There is not at present a complete train of artillery for a single one of the four regiments in the service; and I beg leave to suggest the necessity of an appropriation for the purpose of furnishing the number of pieces required to arm the existing regiments properly, as well as to furnish batteries for two battalions of light artillery. I would respectfully recommend the establishment of a rocket brigade. These projectiles have lately been brought to great perfection in Europe, and are now regarded as a formidable addition to the efficiency of their armies. That of the United States, although comparatively so small, should not be entirely deficient in any one of the elements which go to make up the power and efficiency of the best-constituted armies of Europe. With four regiments of artillery, we are nearly without field-pieces and trains; we are without light artillery altogether, and have yet to learn its management; and we are entirely ignorant of the use of so formidable a weapon as the rocket. These deficiencies in an arm which, in modern warfare, produces the most decisive results, ought to be remedied without delay.

It is obviously of the first importance that the artillery and munitions of war furnished to the troops should be fabricated and prepared on a uniform system, according to established patterns; and the first step toward this object, is to prepare drawings of all the parts of such a system in the utmost detail. To accomplish this, it is intended to detail, for this especial duty, three competent officers, with the requisite number of draughtsmen, the result of whose labors, after due revision and approval by the Secretary of War, shall be conformed to in the ordnance department; the patterns thus established not to be changed, without the sanction of the same authority by which they were approved.

An estimate for the small sum required to cover the expense incidental to such an arrangement, is embraced in the general estimate of this Department for the ensuing year.

I cannot forbear to repeat the recommendations made in my last annual report, for the establishment of a national foundry and powder manufactory, and the erection of a manufactory of small-arms west of the Alleghany mountains, upon the plan therein proposed. The armory manufactory at Harper's Ferry, which is conducted with great ability by its present superintendent, Colonel Lucas, requires considerable alterations and repairs. The temporary workshops erected there are altogether insufficient, and now that the usefulness of this establishment is placed beyond doubt, permanent buildings ought to be substituted, agreeably to some well-digested plan, both as to their construction and position. Permission has been granted by the Department to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to run their road through the lands belonging to the United States at this place, passing along the line of the work-shops, from whence the company have the option of choosing either of two routes, the one leading along the wall of the canal, and the other by the hill-side. The former would have been the most advantageous to the United States, as the company's works would have strengthened the wall, which is very defective, and requires such extensive repairs that it will probably be necessary to rebuild it altogether; but the difference of expense to the company was represented by the estimates of the cost of both routes to be so great—upward of $50,000—that the river route could not be insisted upon without the United States paying a part or the whole of it. The Department had no authority to make such an arrangement without the previous consent of Congress, and therefore granted the option to the company. It is understood, however, by the parties to the contract, that upon Congress desiring that the river line should be adopted, it may be done on Government agreeing to pay the difference of expense between the two routes.

Reflection and experience confirm the view taken in the last annual report from this Department, on the policy of selling the mineral lands belonging to the United States. Their retention in the hands of Government presents an insuperable obstacle to the exploration of the mines, and impedes the natural progress of that portion of the country.

The corps of topographical engineers has been increased, agreeably to the act of the last session, with the exception of the officers whose nominations were not acted upon by the Senate, and whose places could not, therefore, be supplied. With few exceptions, the civil works under the charge of the military engineers have been transferred to this corps, and a system has been adopted, which, when fully carried into effect, cannot fail to produce the most salutary results. The several portions of the country where these works are being carried on are divided into districts of limited extent, and officers are permanently assigned to them; by this method time is saved, and much useless expense avoided, as well as better information acquired. Over these limited commands a system of supervision and inspectorship is exercised by the older officers, by means of which their superior knowledge and experience are brought in aid of all the plans, estimates, and constructions.

The officers of the corps who are employed in the superintendence of works carried on by corporations and States, of which there are but four, are gradually being withdrawn, according to the provisions of the law regulating the establishment of the army; and they will all be placed on national works as soon as it can be done without injury to those they are now conducting.

The duties enjoined upon the Department by resolutions of Congress, ordering certain surveys, have not been performed for want of means to defray the necessary expenses. These are paid invariably from special appropriations applicable to each object, or out of the usual annual appropriation of $30,000 for military surveys, which was withheld this year. Owing to this cause the following surveys have been omitted: That of the Tennessee river from its mouth to the highest point of steamboat navigation; of Elizabeth river, from the outlet of the Dismal Swamp canal to Sewall's Point; of Annapolis harbor; that from the harbor of Norfolk, Virginia, to Charleston, South Carolina, in reference to inland steamboat navigation. Partial appropriations were made for a survey of the Des Moines and Iowa rivers, and it is intended to commence the work early in the spring. These appropriations are, however, quite inadequate, and I would respectfully suggest that they be, in all such cases, based upon estimates furnished by this Department. Great delay and expense would be avoided by this procedure, for it not unfrequently happens that the appropriation is exhausted, just as the men and materials are collected on the spot to proceed to work, and the former have to be discharged for want of funds to continue them in the service.

It is deemed very important that the annual appropriation for military surveys should be made. We are still lamentably ignorant of the geography and resources of our country; and it is essential to its defense, as well as to its improvement, that the boundaries, the course of rivers, the size and form and obstacles to navigation of the lakes, and the direction and height of the mountains, should be accurately determined and delineated. Much has been done during the last two years towards the attainment of this important branch of knowledge; at least one hundred points of latitude and eighty of longitude have been accurately established, and the whole country west of the Mississippi and north of the Missouri, has been surveyed and delineated. The military reconnaissances made in Florida have enabled the Department to present a tolerably accurate map of the interior of that Territory, which has been engraved by order of Congress. An accurate map was made of the country lately occupied by the Cherokees, when it was supposed that it might become the theater of military operations; and there exist in the Topographical Bureau all the materials collected by its officers in the military and other surveys ordered by Congress. I earnestly recommend, therefore, that the usual annual appropriations for the military and other surveys be continued, in order that these useful operations may be proceeded with, and especially that complete hydrographical surveys may be made of the lakes.

The singular and important discrepancies which have been brought to my notice in existing charts of Delaware bay would seem to call for immediate attention to that important estuary. Its survey may be considered as belonging to the survey of the coast, now being made under Mr. Hassler. But it would probably facilitate his operations, and the sooner give to commerce the advantages of a correct chart of this bay, if it were immediately attended to under a special appropriation. There being an officer of the corps of topographical engineers already on duty in that quarter, with a proper understanding between the Topographical Bureau and Mr. Hassler, the work might be done the earlier under the former, and with all requisite connection, with the great and highly interesting operations of the latter.

I would recommend, likewise, that a survey be made of the country between the Neenah or Fox and the Wisconsin rivers, with a view of establishing a water communication from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river, which would be in the highest degree important to this Department in time of war, and useful for the transportation of supplies in time of peace.

The report of the Surgeon General shows the extent of usefulness and the great efficiency of the department under his immediate superintendence. The severe examination to which applicants for admission to the medical staff of the army are subjected has secured the services of men of a high order of talents and attainments, while the method introduced into the administration of all its operations has produced great economy as well as activity and fidelity in the discharge of the duties of this branch of the service. The great extent to which these duties have lately been enlarged, by the increase of the army and its operations in the field, the employment of militia, and the augmentation of the number of permanent posts, renders it necessary that an additional clerk should be employed in the office of the Surgeon General, in order to aid in the settlement of its accounts; and I respectfully recommend that the addition be made.

The quartermaster's department, and that of the commissary of subsistence, have been increased agreeably to the act of Congress, and the duties of both these branches of the public service have been discharged with intelligence and activity.

The duties of the paymaster's department have been discharged with singular fidelity; and, in justice to the officers engaged in their performance, I beg leave to suggest the propriety and usefulness of creating an intervening grade between the paymaster general and the paymasters: that of assistant paymaster general, with the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel. The good of this valuable branch of the public service would be much promoted by such a measure. A provision was struck out of the bill for the increase and organization of the army, for giving a small percentage on disbursements to officers engaged in paying the militia. The peculiar and embarrassing nature of this service, which occasions unavoidable losses, would seem to render such a provision just and proper.

It will be seen by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, that the number of persons on the pension rolls amounts to forty-one thousand eight hundred and seventy; that there have been fourteen hundred and sixty-one deaths during the year ending the 30th of September last, and the addition to the pension rolls in the same year, has been two thousand three hundred and fifty-four. The addition to the list of widows' pensions will increase the expenditure about $1,372,000; and, to meet payments now due, the sum of $245,000 will be immediately required, as no appropriation has yet been made for paying the pensions granted by the act of July 7, 1838. Arrears are, therefore, due all such pensioners as have been entered on the rolls under this act. These arrears will be due on the 31st of December next, and justice to the claimants requires that an early appropriation should be made for their payment.

I respectfully recommend that the early attention of Congress should be called to the compensation to be granted to pension agents for discharging the duties of their office. The performance of these duties is attended with labor and expense and very considerable responsibility, and it is unjust to exact it from any one without remuneration. The agents have been induced to continue to pay the pensioners in the expectation that an act would be passed for their relief. If this is not done, this Department will find it utterly impracticable any longer to execute the pension laws.

Connected with this subject is the inconvenience which has been experienced in carrying into effect the provisions of the law passed at the last session providing that the amounts of pensions unclaimed for a certain period after becoming due and payable, shall be paid only at the Treasury. The operation of this law has proved very harassing to the accounting officers charged with the duty it enjoins, and very inconvenient to the pensioner. The period of eight months fixed by it for the unclaimed pension funds to be returned to the Treasury and to be claimed here and drawn out through the Pension Office and that of the Third Auditor, is too short. Small pensioners living a distance from the agency were in the habit of going there not oftener than once a year, whereas they are now obliged to go there more frequently, to their great inconvenience, or to employ an agent to receive their pensions either at the nearest agency or at Washington. The great burden thrown upon the office of the Third Auditor, by that law, will be better understood by the letter of that officer, herewith submitted.

I beg leave again to call your attention to the subject of frauds and impositions practiced both upon the Government and the ignorant and unwary pensioners, whereby the benevolent intentions of Congress towards the veterans of the Revolution and the sufferers by the late war, are frustrated by unprincipled and designing men. The law passed July 7, 1838, will occasion an expenditure of about $1,500,000 in the year 1839, and it is to be feared that not more than one half of that sum will reach the objects whose distresses it was intended to relieve; the rest will, too probably, be swallowed by usurious agents, or wrested from the Department by fraudulent applications. These practices ought to be checked by a law imposing a severe penalty upon persons who are found guilty of them.

Independent of the removal of the Cherokees, the operations of the Indian department within the last year have been extensive and important. The entire Creek nation, with the exception of a small number of fugitives among the Cherokees and Seminoles, has emigrated and formed permanent settlements beyond the Missouri river. Of the Chickasaws, not more than two hundred remain east of the Mississippi. It is estimated that about three thousand Choctaws still live in their old country, and they will probably continue there until the titles set up by them to reserves under the treaty of 1830, are satisfactorily adjusted. By the interposition of the authorities of the State of Indiana, nearly all the Pottawatomies residing within its limits have recently been removed. The emigration of the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pottawatomies in Illinois, has progressed slowly; nearly fifteen hundred yet remain there. A small band of Appalachicolas has been removed. About four hundred Seminoles emigrated in 1836, and fifteen hundred in 1837 and 1838; the military movements for the removal of the residue still continue to be vigorously prosecuted, as has already been explained. At the close of the present season, there will be, in the States and Territories, about twenty-two thousand Indians, who, it is desirable, should be removed as early as practicable to the West. They are the New York Indians, the Wyandots in Ohio, the Miamies in Indiana, the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pottawatomies in Illinois; the Winnebagoes and Menomonees in Wisconsin; the Ottawas and Chippewas in Michigan; and the Seminoles in Florida. In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, conditionally ratifying the treaty with the New York Indians, that instrument and the amendments to it have been submitted to them for their assent, and that of all the bands except the Senecas has been obtained; and it is believed that these will not withhold their assent eventually. There is reason to believe that a treaty of cession and removal may soon be effected with the Miamies, which will relieve the State of Indiana from the incumbrance of its Indian population. An exploring party of Winnebagoes has been authorized to visit the region beyond the Missouri, and but little doubt is entertained that they will there find a tract of country suited to their habits and wants. Similar parties of Ottawas and Chippewas, and of the Chippewas of Saginaw, have examined the same section of country, and found locations with which they believe their people will be satisfied. There are conflicting parties among the Wyandots, which render the completion of anything more than an arrangement for partial removal improbable at present. The information received from the Menomonees holds out the prospect that a treaty might be made with them for the relinquishment of their possessions in Wisconsin, should Congress authorize the measure.

Commissioners have been appointed to examine claims, for the payment of which provision was made in the treaties with the Miamies, Chippewas, the Sioux, the Sacs and Foxes, and the Winnebagoes, ratified at the last session, and instructions issued for the execution of other stipulations in them. The commissioners intrusted with the duties of carrying into effect the treaty with the Cherokees, of 1835, have steadily pursued their labors. It is supposed that all the claims, except those for reservations, have been investigated. More than one million of dollars have been paid to them and their creditors in the ceded country, and upwards of one million have been remitted to be paid to them, on their arrival west, on account of claims allowed in their favor. In conformity with the treaty, a patent has been issued, and will be shortly transmitted to them, for the thirteen million six hundred thousand acres set apart for them, and they will have individual and national wealth sufficient to insure their prosperity. The commissioners who were selected to examine claims to reserves under the fourteenth article of the treaty with the Choctaws of 1830, had made considerable progress, when their appointments were terminated by the expiration of the law on the first of August last. The final adjustment of these claims is important to the inhabitants of the State of Mississippi, and to the Indians who remain among them; to the former as a measure essential to the settlement of land titles, and to the latter as conducive to their removal and union with their countrymen, who are making rapid advances in wealth and improvement. It is, therefore, respectfully recommended that the commission be renewed at an early day. The stipulations in the treaty with the Chickasaws, which were to be executed east of the Mississippi, have been nearly fulfilled. About two hundred reserves are yet to be located, and of those located, about two hundred to be sold. It is estimated that the proceeds of future sales will be sufficient to pay their debts, and to defray the expense of their removal and subsistence. They will then have a national fund of $2,000,000, yielding them an annual income of one $100,000, a sum adequate to all their possible wants.

Of the emigrated tribes, all the accounts that have been received are encouraging. The recently emigrated Creeks have formed agricultural and trading establishments, and found in the comfort around them, and the prospect of individual wealth before them, the strongest inducement to cultivate friendly relations with their brethren, with other tribes, and with the United States. The council convened by the Cherokees had no object unfriendly to our people or Government. This belief originated from a misapprehension of the condition and temper of those Indians. It is not probable that those who emigrated many years since, and from whom the call of the council proceeded, would jeopard their whole property, the farms, the stock, and merchandise they possess, and the large annuities they receive from the United States, for the gratification of commencing a war which they could not be ignorant must terminate in their utter destruction. It appears from subsequent information that the Cherokees hold an annual council for the purpose of legislation, and that, in order to revive an ancient association of the tribes, formed for the preservation of peace among themselves, they invited, in 1837, the Creeks, Senecas, and others, to meet them; and in 1838 renewed their invitations, and extended them to more distant nations. They applied, in some instances, to the United States officers to write letters of invitation, and their request was complied with; and where the wampum was sent, that symbol contained no red beads or other war-like tokens. Notwithstanding, however, the peaceful appearances which characterized these preliminaries, some of the more northern tribes suspected the object of the council to be hostile to the whites, and refused to attend; the same opinion might naturally have been entertained by the officers of Government at distant posts, but it would have been imprudent to have acted upon such suspicions. To preserve our influence over the Indians we must abstain from all unnecessary interference in their local affairs. To disturb their councils, or to attempt to overawe their proceedings by an armed force, might excite unfriendly feelings, and tend to produce the very evil the Government is so anxious to avoid. Nor could such an interposition have led to the discovery of the designs of the council. If the views of that body had been hostile, and the occasion of the representatives of so many tribes being assembled had been deemed a fitting one to consult on war-like measures, those consultations would have been secret, and the presence of our troops would have only led them to conceal their design still more deeply.

Since this event the Department has again been called upon by the commanding general of the western division of the army to furnish additional troops to guard the southwestern frontier from apprehended attacks from the Indians inhabiting Texas, circumstances having led to the belief that these Indians had been excited by the Mexican authorities to attack the Texans. This call increased the vigilance of the Department, and inquiries were instituted which did not elicit any information that would have justified me in recommending such a draft of militia as was proposed to aid the regular force on that frontier. The Indians within the territory of the United States have been warned that they will not be permitted to take part in any contest between Mexico and Texas, or to pass into the territory of the latter with hostile intent; and that the amount of their annuities will be stopped if they disobey this order, without prejudice to other measures which will be taken to enforce its observance.

Upon the first receipt of the intelligence of the appearance of the small-pox among the tribes on the Missouri river, supplies of money and of vaccine matter were liberally furnished, the employment of physicians was authorized, and instructions given for the immediate and thorough vaccination of the Indians. The reports, thus far, do not show satisfactorily to what extent this duty has been performed.

The subject of our Indian affairs, confessedly the most difficult and complicated under the supervision of the Department, being the last year entirely new to me, I forbore to suggest any changes in their management; but subsequent experience and reflection have convinced me that the present system is defective, and that the evils which spring from it will not be remedied by the measures heretofore recommended, nor by the bill which, at the last session of Congress, received the sanction of one branch of the Legislature. It is unnecessary, however, to discuss the defects or merits of this bill, because the preliminary condition to its being carried into execution—the previous consent of the tribes—cannot be complied with. The Choctaws and Cherokees have expressed their unwillingness to enter into the confederation, or to adopt the form of government the bill proposes. If even the most insignificant changes in the settled forms of government require to be considered with great care, how much more cautious ought we to be in any attempts to introduce those forms among a people who have hitherto lived with scarcely any knowledge of them. I would recommend, as the first step, that the tribes should be encouraged to adopt a system of self-government adapted to their wants and condition, with which there should be as little interference on our part as possible; and that their chiefs be invited to attend an annual council, at which the agents of the Government and the commanding officer of the nearest station should be present. In this manner the Government would exercise a salutary influence over them, become acquainted with their wants, and heal their differences with each other. It appears to me, likewise, that the Indian agents should not be attached to any one tribe, as experience proves that they become so identified with those whose peculiar interests are confided to their care, that they imbibe their prejudices and espouse their quarrels. It ought to be in the power of Government to change their residence from time to time, and by assembling them once a year in general council with the chiefs of all the tribes, they will understand and seek to promote the general interests of the red men.

I would recommend that the system hitherto pursued for the education of the Indians, by which alone their civilization can be effected, be changed. At present the Indian youth receives an education which is altogether useless to him when he returns to his home in the western wilds. He can read, write, and cipher, and in his native village there are no books to read, no writings required, and none but the most simple accounts kept; such as are reckoned on the fingers and notched on a stick. He has acquired no knowledge which can be usefully applied for his own benefit or for that of his people; and he has forgotten how to trap and hunt. As a matter of course, then, he and his acquisitions are despised, and the half-educated savage too often becomes a profligate and drunken vagabond. The remedy for this evil appears to me to be the introduction of manual-labor schools, where the Indian, at the same time that he receives the rudiments of education and is taught the Christian faith, will acquire some knowledge of farming and of the useful arts, which will secure to him the admiration and gratitude of his countrymen on his return among them, and enable him, not only to render them the most essential services, but to teach them by his example the vast advantages to be derived from knowledge, and induce them to become a civilized community.

The important interests involved in the proper administration of Indian affairs, and the great distance of the theater of their management from the supervisory power at Washington, require, in my opinion, that there should be attached to the office of the commissioner an inspector charged to visit, from time to time, the stations of the disbursing officers and Indian agents; inspect their books, examine into their proceedings, view the condition of the different tribes, and furnish such a report as will enable the Department to correct abuses, to understand and provide for the wants of the Indians, and, generally, to extend over the whole matter a more complete supervision than has heretofore been found practicable. By such means, in conjunction with a more liberal policy towards the interpreters, who exercise great influence over the Indians; by a proper attention to the chiefs, through whom alone the people can be approached, and who ought, by every fair means, to be conciliated and attached to the United States; and by the cooperation of the traders, whom I have always found ready to lend their aid to the Government, reasonable hopes may be entertained of extending the blessings and advantages of Christianity and civilization to the Indian race.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. R. POINSETT.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
November 30, 1838.

SIR: In the performance of a duty annually devolving on this Department, I submit the following report:

The squadron employed in the Mediterranean during the past year, under Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, consisted of two frigates, a sloop of war, and a schooner. These vessels, with the exception of the sloop of war, having returned home either for repairs, or in consequence of the terms of service of their crews having expired, will be replaced by a ship of the line, a frigate of equal force, and a dispatch brig or schooner.

The whole will be under the orders of Commodore Isaac Hull.

Although some of the causes which originally dictated the policy of employing a portion of our navy in the Mediterranean have, in a great measure, ceased, still it is believed that as a school of discipline under experienced officers, as a means of exhibiting a portion of our naval force in contact and comparison with that of the principal maritime States of Europe, and for the purpose of affording countenance and protection to our commerce, a perseverance in this policy will equally contribute to the good of the service and the honor of the United States.

The squadron now in the Pacific, under Commodore Henry E. Ballard, comprises one ship of the line, two sloops of war, and two schooners.

These last requiring extensive repairs have been ordered home the ensuing spring, or as soon after as the public interest will admit; and the ship of the line may also be expected to return about the same time, as the terms of service of most of her crew will then be about expiring.

The unsettled and precarious relations subsisting between the South American States bordering on the Pacific, in my opinion, render it essential to the protection of our commerce, that at least an equal force should be maintained in that quarter. Accordingly, measures will be taken to replace the vessels ordered home by others not less efficient for that service.

The force operating on the coast of Brazil, under Commodore John B. Nicolson, consists of one razee, one sloop of war, and one brig. No change is at present contemplated. The present force is deemed adequate to the protection of our commerce in that quarter, and it is believed that no reduction would be consistent with the attainment of that object.

At the date of the last report of the Secretary of the Navy, the squadron employed on the West India station and in the Gulf of Mexico, under

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Commodore Alexander J. Dallas, consisted of one frigate, five sloops of war, and one small vessel. The frigate and one of the sloops having recently returned to Boston for repairs, it is contemplated to send another frigate, and to increase the number of sloops of war on that station to seven. The force will then be composed of one frigate, seven sloops of war, and one small vessel.

As the blockade of the Mexican ports by the French squadron continues to be strictly enforced, and as indications of a revolutionary spirit have lately been exhibited at Tampico, it is believed that, under existing circumstances, as well as in view of future contingencies, no reduction of the proposed force can be prudently made.

A frigate and sloop of war, which, as stated in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, were then preparing for a cruise in the Indian seas, under Commodore George C. Read, sailed from Norfolk on the 6th of May last. By the latest advices from Commodore Read, dated the 28th of July, he had reached Rio de Janeiro, from whence he was to depart the next day. Having reason to believe it would conduce to the protection and safety of our citizens and commerce in those remote regions, I have directed these vessels to visit the Sandwich and Society Islands on their way home.

That the officers employed on these various services have performed their duties with equal activity, vigilance, and prudence, is sufficiently evidenced by the fact, that notwithstanding the wars and revolutions which still agitate so great a portion of the South American States bordering on the Pacific, and the long protracted blockade of the ports of Mexico and of Buenos Ayres, the persons and property of citizens of the United States have, in no case which has come to the knowledge of this Department, sustained outrage or wrong; while, on the other hand, nothing has occurred throughout the whole of our intercourse or interposition to disturb the relations of peace between us and the parties in collision with each other.

The exploring expedition, on the resignation of Commodore Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, in consequence of ill health, was placed under the command of Lieutenant Charles Wilkes, with some modification of force, and finally sailed from Norfolk on the 19th of August. It now consists of the sloops of war Vincennes and Peacock, the store-ship Relief, the brig Porpoise, and the pilot-boat schooners Seagull and Flying Fish. Letters from Lieutenant Wilkes announce the safe arrival of these vessels at Madeira, with the exception of the Relief, which vessel was ordered by him to proceed direct for Rio de Janeiro. It will appear from the estimates for 1839, that the annual expense of the expedition under its present organization will be very considerably less than that required for it as originally contemplated.

A number of scientific gentlemen who had accepted appointments in the expedition under an impression that their services would be required, and their emoluments continued during the period anticipated for the completion of its objects, were not included in this new arrangement. They have asked to be remunerated for their sacrifices and disappointments, and I now submit the propriety as well as justice of their claims.

The act of Congress approved 22d December, 1837, authorized the President of the United States to employ the public vessels in cruising along the Atlantic coast during the winter season, for the purpose of affording relief to merchantmen in distress. Under this law the sloop of war Erie, the brigs Pioneer and Consort, the schooner Active, and the steamship Fulton, were occasionally employed with beneficial results. Owing to the want of proper vessels at the disposal of this Department after supplying the necessities of foreign stations, the steamship Fulton is the only one now available for this service.

To aid in making the general survey of the coast of the United States, Lieutenants Gedney and Blake, with other naval officers, were, on the application of the Secretary of the Treasury, placed under his directions, and such other assistance afforded as circumstances permitted.

The survey of the southern coast, from Tybee bar to Hunting Island, May river, as directed by the act of Congress of March 3, 1837, has been completed by Lieutenant Wilkes, a copy of whose report will be communicated to Congress early in the approaching session. The surveys of the harbors of Beaufort and Wilmington, North Carolina, provided for by the same act, will be commenced forthwith by Lieutenant Glynn, of the Navy; and it is expected will be completed in time to be communicated to Congress previous to its adjournment.

The delay in carrying this act into execution has arisen from a want of proper vessels for that service, which will now be performed in a steam vessel loaned by the War Department. The attention of Lieutenant Glynn will also be directed to an examination of the coast between the mouths of the Mississippi and Sabine rivers, as directed by the act of 7th July, 1838.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress of the 28th June last, and the supplementary act of the 9th July following, authorizing the appointment of three competent persons to test the various inventions which might be presented to their notice, for the improvement and safety of steam-boilers, a board has been designated by the President to make the requisite examinations and experiments, and it is presumed will report the results at the opening of the ensuing session of Congress.

In conformity with the provisions of the act of 7th July, 1838, making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, and buoys, the coasts of the Atlantic and of the great lakes were divided into eight districts, and an officer of the Navy appointed to each, with orders to report to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of carrying out the views of Congress, under his directions.

The instructions of the President for establishing lines of dispatch vessels, to run during the continuance of the blockade of the Mexican ports, by a French squadron, between New York and Vera Cruz, and New Orleans and Tampico, at stated and regular periods, have been carried into effect. The United States brig Consort, Lieutenant William H. Gardner, sailed from New York the 1st of November, and the revenue cutter Woodbury, loaned by the Treasury Department, it is presumed is now on her way to Tampico, under the command of Lieutenant John S. Nicholas, of the Navy. This arrangement it is believed will be highly beneficial to the commercial community, by affording not only the means of communication, but of transporting their funds to the United States.

The state of the Navy pension fund is as follows:

The number of invalid pensioners is	440.
The annual sum required to pay them is.....	$33,496 23
The number of widow pensioners is	302.
The annual sum required to pay them is.....	55,716 00
The number of minor children pensioners is	105.
The annual sum required to pay them is.....	13,908 00
Whole number of pensioners is 847, and the whole annual amount required to pay them is.....	103,120 23

The amount of stocks owned by the Navy pension fund on the 31 of March, 1837, was.....	$1,115,329 53
Do. do. on the 1st of Oct., 1838..	390,832 25
Difference.....	$724,497 28

which was sold, and the proceeds of the sale, with the interest and dividend of the capital, were applied to the payment of pensions and arrears of pensions. Of the balance of stock, $390,832 25, owned by the fund 1st of October, 1838, the nominal amount of $97,469 16 has been directed to be sold to meet payments on the 1st of January, 1839, so that the actual capital of the fund for the year 1839 will be only $293,363 09.

It will thus be seen that under the operation of successive pension laws, each widening and extending the stream of public munificence, this fund is rapidly decreasing, inasmuch that in the course of a very few years large appropriations will be required to redeem the faith of Congress pledged for its support.

PRIVATEER PENSION FUND.

The number of privateer pensioners is thirty-six. The annual amount required to pay them is $2,862. No payments were made to these pensioners during the past year, as the privateer pension fund had been exhausted.

This fund, it will be perceived, failed in 1836; and, consequently, no payments have been made since that time. The subject was brought to the notice of the President in former reports from this Department; and I have only to add, that as, in conformity with the law establishing and appropriating this fund, the certificates of pensions were granted during life, it would appear that the nation stands pledged to furnish the means of fulfilling the obligation.

NAVY HOSPITAL FUND.

The balance in the Treasury to the credit of this fund on the 1st of Oct., 1837, was...$94,202 36
Receipts to the 1st of October, 1838... 31,242 92

Expenditures to 1st of October, 1838. $125,445 28
1,975 00

Balance.....$123,470 28

The construction of a dry-dock at some point in the harbor of New York, has been heretofore repeatedly recommended by this Department, and is every year becoming more necessary to the purposes of the Navy. Whatever diversity of opinion may exist as to the most eligible site, all seem to unite in favor of the object. The two docks at Norfolk and Boston are entirely insufficient to meet the requirements of the service; delays in repairing ships, at all times injurious, and in time of war dangerous to the interests and safety of the country, frequently occur in consequence of their being no vacant dock to receive them; and at this moment two line-of-battle ships are lying at New York in a decayed and rapidly decaying state, which can neither be repaired where they are, nor removed elsewhere for that purpose without great risk and expense.

The subject of a naval academy has also been more than once presented for consideration. Such an institution is earnestly desired by the officers of the Navy, and it is believed would greatly conduce to the benefit of the service generally. The propriety of affording young midshipmen the means and opportunity for the acquisition of that knowledge and those sciences which are either absolutely necessary, or highly useful to their profession, would seem to have been recognized by Congress in the liberal provision for teachers and professors of mathematics, on board our ships of war and at the principal navy-yards. Those, however, who have had the best opportunities for observing the practical operation of this system, are of opinion that it does not answer the purposes for which it was intended, and that other and more effectual means are required. A naval academy which should combine the acquisition of those sciences, and that knowledge without which professional duties cannot be performed to the public satisfaction, with that practical experience which is, if possible, still more indispensable, would, in my opinion, add little to the expense of the present defective system, and be followed by benefits which would far more than repay the cost of such an establishment.

The attention of the President and Congress is also solicited to that part of the estimates of the Board of Navy Commissioners which contemplates the building of five brigs or schooners, the frames of which have been collected under the law for the gradual improvement of the Navy; and which are required for dispatch vessels, surveys, and other purposes.

It is presumed that no arguments are necessary to enforce the propriety of retaining a sufficient number of ships in commission to afford active sea service to the officers of the Navy. Such service is manifestly essential to discipline, to experience, and to those habits of hardihood without which no officer can adequately fulfill his duty. The same practical experience necessary to eminence in any other profession is most emphatically so in that of a seaman; the self-possession and skill required to meet the exposures and dangers incident to a sea life, both in peace and in war, can only be acquired on the seas; the same consequences which result from idleness and neglect, in all other conditions of life, will assuredly follow in this; and charged, as the officer is, with protecting the property, as well as defending the rights and honor of his country, his incapacity is not less dishonorable to himself than injurious to her. Unless, however, his country affords him opportunities of acquiring this professional experience by often calling him into active service, it would be unjust to complain of his inability to perform these high duties, and it is only when he declines these opportunities that he can be fairly charged with being ignorant of what he has never been permitted to learn.

Experience has also demonstrated that it is only by frequency of active service at sea, that the otherwise unavoidable consequences of a long peace can, in any degree, be arrested. All other expedients will be found either entirely useless, or only partially operative; and I abstain from suggesting any material alterations in the system of the service, not only for that reason, but because my limited experience in this Department has not given me sufficient confidence in my own opinions, or, perhaps, entitled them to the consideration of others.

There are other strong and imposing reasons for keeping up the present naval establishment of the United States in full vigor and activity.

The unremitting attention which, since the late war with England, and the secrets it disclosed, has been paid by the maritime powers of Europe to the improvement and perfection of their ships of war and of naval discipline, calls for awakened vigilance on our part. The position of the United States, remote as it is from the scene of European rivalry, affords no immunity from its consequences. Commerce makes neighbors of all nations, and the conflicts of interest or ambition between any two can scarcely fail of involving many others. Against such imminent contingencies, an adequate naval force, keeping pace with the commerce and resources of the country, well manned, and, above all, well disciplined, is our most effectual security. It is equally recommended by its comprehensive sphere of action; the facility with which it can be directed to distant and various points, and by its freedom from almost all those objections which a wise people so justly cherish towards great military establishments. In addition to these considerations, it comes recommended to the people of the United States as the best guardian of their flag, wherever it is carried by their enterprise, as well as by having so largely contributed to that fund of national reputation, which being a common possession, constitutes one of the strongest bonds of our Union.

Respectfully submitted,

J. K. PAULDING.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, }
December 3, 1838. }

SIR: The post routes of the United States in operation on the 1st day of July last were, as nearly as can be ascertained, 134,818 miles in extent. The rate of annual transportation on that day was about 34,580,202 miles, and its cost $3,131,308, viz:

	Miles.	Cost.
By horse and sulky.....	11,573,918	$831,028
By stage and coach.....	20,593,192	1,889,792
By steamboat and railroad.	2,413,092	410,488
	34,580,202	$3,131,308

This is exclusive of transportation by steamboats and other vessels, under the 5th and 6th sections of the act of 1825, which costs about $16,000 more.

The lettings of the present year have been at a considerable advance on former prices, except those of the express mails, which have been at a saving of about twenty-nine per cent.

To avoid danger of embarrassment from the recent check on the revenue of the Department, retrenchments and suspensions of service have been made to the amount of $359,641 per annum. Great care has been taken to make them in service which was of the least value to the community.

The report of the First Assistant Postmaster General, herewith transmitted, furnishes interesting details as to the mail service.

On the 1st July last the number of post offices was 12,519, being an increase of 752 during the preceding year. The number established was 1,104, and the number discontinued 352. During the same year, the appointments of postmasters were 2,068.

The number of post offices on this day is 12,553.

The number of contractors in service during the last year was about 1,947. Of this number, 592 have been fined or had deductions made from their pay, on account of delinquencies and omissions. The aggregate amount of fines and deductions, excluding remissions, was $67,128 54.

The revenue of the Department for the year ending June 30, 1837, was.....$4,100,605 43
The accruing expenditures were about..... 3,303,428 03

Excess of revenue..... $797,177 40

The revenue of the Department for the year ending 30th June last, is estimated to have been.....$4,262,145

The engagements and liabilities of the Department for the same year were 4,680,068

Excess of engagements and liabilities.. $417,923

The surplus on hand has prevented embarrassment from this excess of liabilities.

Compared with the preceding year, the revenue has increased about four per cent. This is an unexpected and most gratifying result.

The cash on hand on the 1st instant, was as follows:

In banks, available, or expected to be so after the 1st January next.....$84,220 01

In draft offices and due from the Canada post office.....229,848 74

Total.....$314,068 75

It will be seen that the surplus funds of the Department, which at one time exceeded $800,000, have been greatly diminished.

The determination of Congress not to reduce letter postages, as suggested in my annual report of 1836, was considered in the light of an instruction to apply the cash on hand, and the increasing current revenue, to improvements of the mail service. It was estimated that the seven hundred new routes established in 1836, and the improvements of service on many old ones, in conjunction with the usual annual increase of business in the country, would add at least fifteen per cent. to the revenue of the last year, which would be maintained with a still further increase during the present year. The extension of mail service was accordingly carried far enough to consume this anticipated increase, and also, in the progress of a few years, reduce the surplus on hand to the lowest amount consistent with the convenience of the Department. The general financial disasters of last year have not reduced the revenue, as might have been expected, but have prevented most of the anticipated increase, and thrown the Department upon its surplus to sustain a large portion of its extensions. The indications now are, that there will be a slight improvement in the revenue of the current fiscal year over the preceding, but not enough to produce any material effect. An advance somewhat greater may be reasonably expected next year, but not great enough to meet the increasing cost of mail service, and put into operation the new routes established at the last session of Congress. It will hence be seen, that, for more than a year to come, the curtailment, rather than the extension of service, on routes now in operation, is to be expected.

In general, the accounts of postmasters are rendered, and the duties of contractors performed, with the utmost fidelity and precision. Indeed, the world may be challenged for any similar establishment, embracing so much intelligence, activity, and energy, and yielding to millions of mankind so much unqualified good. The chief obstructions which it has recently encountered in its career of usefulness, have arisen from the deficiencies and unreasonable demands of corporate bodies which it had employed, or deemed it useful to employ, in the public service.

In managing its funds through the public agents, who are under bonds for their security, and removable at will, and in dealing with the individual freemen of the States and of the United States in competition with each other, it finds all its operations easy, safe, and prosperous.

At their last session, Congress enacted "that each and every railroad within the limits of the United States which now is, or hereafter may be made and completed, shall be a post route, and the Postmaster General shall cause the mail to be transported thereon, provided he can have it done on reasonable terms, and not paying more than twenty-five per centum over and above what similar transportation would cost in post coaches."

To avoid further trouble with the railroad companies on the main mail lines, it was determined to pay them, upon renewal of existing contracts, the highest price which this law would admit. But there was difficulty in fixing on that price. In the first place, it was to be ascertained what Congress meant by the phrase "similar transportation," and, in the next place, what that transportation would cost in post coaches. It was obvious that they could not mean a transportation equal in speed; for that would be impossible. They could not mean the same transportation, or the transportation of the same mail upon the same route; for in that case the word same would have been used instead of the word "similar." It seemed probable that they had reference to the ordinary post coach transportation in the same section of country, and to the points of similarity between that and railroad transportation, intending the additional twenty-five per cent. as compensation for the increased speed. This construction would have given the railroad companies as liberal a compensation as they had a right to expect, inasmuch as it would have materially increased the cost of mail transportation, while, in respect to passengers, produce, and merchandise, the cost is everywhere cheapened by them.

But upon a careful consideration of the words of the law, in connection with the mail service existing at the time of its passage, the Department felt itself constrained to adopt a construction more favorable to the railroad companies. That the word "similar" should be construed as having no reference to speed, was a position which, according to legal as well as just rules of construction, could not be maintained. From New York to Baltimore, the great southern and western mails are united in one. At the latter point they separate, one portion, believed to be the larger, going West, and the other South. It could not be doubted that the transportation of the western mail was, in its bulk, its weight, its importance, and also its speed, more "similar" to that on the main southern line, than any other appertaining to the Department. The Department, therefore, felt constrained to take the cost of that transportation as its guide in fixing on the basis for the allowance to railroad companies on the main southern line, provided for by law. The average cost of this line, from Baltimore to Cincinnati, was found to be $190 per mile. To this sum, twenty-five per cent. was added, and the aggregate, $237 50, was offered to the railroad companies between Fredericksburg, Virginia, and the Roanoke river, as the highest compensation which could be allowed them by law. The same rule was intended to be applied to all railroads under like circumstances. It was not doubted that this provision would be readily accepted as more ample than the railroad companies had a right to expect, and that this troublesome matter would have been forever adjusted, so far as regards those roads. But the proposal of the Department has not been acceded to, and not only is a higher compensation demanded, but conditions are insisted on as extraordinary as the concession of them would be impolitic and illegal. The Department is, therefore, engaged in making provision for the transportation of the great southern mail by other means after the 1st of January next, not being at liberty under the law, even if it were otherwise disposed, to accede to the terms demanded by the railroad companies. This cannot be done on the same line without public inconvenience in the loss of time; and although a rival line may be raised up in the course of a few months fully equal in speed, yet it will not be so convenient to the Department, or in all respects so useful to the public as the one in question. But having offered all that the law admitted, and more than justice and good policy would have sanctioned had no law been passed, the Department does not feel itself in any way responsible for the public inconvenience which may ensue.

These details have been given that Congress may correct the construction given to the law of last session if too liberal or too strict, or resort to such further enactments as the public interest may seem to require. The principle that Congress may constitutionally make roads for the transportation of the mails, once entertained by some, seems to be generally abandoned; but that they may use for that purpose all roads constructed under the authority of the States, has hitherto been universally conceded. The charters of railroads are granted for the public convenience, and in their construction they are considered so far public that private property is taken at a valuation for their use without the consent of the owner. Whether these roads are to form an exception as to the right of use vested in the United States by the Constitution is a question which it may soon become necessary to consider.

The valuable books and papers of this Department are in constant peril from the combustible nature of the building now occupied. It has a shingle roof and much wood work within, and in the Department and the Auditor's office there are daily about seventy fires. It is, perhaps, in greater danger from the proximity of stables and other wooden buildings which could hardly burn, in some directions of the wind, without involving the whole structure occupied by the Department in their destruction. The consciousness of this constant peril is one of the most painful incidents to the administration of the Department, and I can only relieve myself from a weight of responsibility by requesting you to bring this subject to the serious attention of Congress.

With the highest respect, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Major General of the Army.

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, }
WASHINGTON, Nov. 29, 1838. }

SIR: In conformity with instructions received from the War Department, dated on the 25th of September, 1838, I have the honor to present the following statements and returns:

First—A statement showing the organization of the Army;

Second—A general return of the Army;

Third—Distribution of the troops in the eastern division;

Fourth—Distribution of the troops in the western division;

Fifth—A return showing the number of troops under the command of Brigadier General Taylor, serving in Florida against the Seminole Indians; and Sixth—A statement showing the number of recruits enlisted in the Army, from the 1st January, 1838.

Since my last annual report, the Army has been actively employed, in various quarters, and in various ways. Although it is not in my power to state that the war in Florida against the Seminole Indians has been brought to a close, there is every probability, from the extreme misery to which the Indians have been reduced, and the indications they have manifested to surrender, that the war will not be of long continuance. A report of the operations in Florida, up to the close of the command of Major General Jesup, has been made to you by that officer, and was laid before Congress at its last session, and printed by the authority of that body.

Previously to his withdrawal from the command in Florida, General Jesup reported that active operations would necessarily cease by the 30th of April, in consequence of the climate, and that a portion of the troops would be available, during the unhealthy season, for service elsewhere; orders were therefore given for the four regiments of artillery acting as infantry, and one regiment of infantry, to march into the Cherokee country and report to Major General Scott, to be employed, if necessary, in obliging the Cherokees to fulfill their treaty stipulations in reference to their removal to the country allotted to them west of the Mississippi.

Upon the retiring of General Jesup from Florida, Brigadier General Taylor, the officer next in rank there, was assigned to the command. At the close of the campaign, nearly all the volunteer force in Florida was discharged, leaving in that Territory the whole of the second regiment of dragoons, the first and sixth regiments of infantry, and some Florida volunteers. This force was distributed among the principal depots, and the stations along the borders of the settlements, to guard the supplies and afford protection to the inhabitants, most of the interior posts being abandoned; experience having shown that they could not be occupied during the summer and part of the autumn, without great sacrifice of life. During the past summer, although the troops were kept in continual commotion, the enemy, scattered in small bands, succeeded in committing several murders, which, on a line of frontier so extensive, could scarcely have been prevented.

In the month of April, a battalion of the sixth regiment of infantry was sent from Tampa to St. Marks, to prevent a junction between some Creek Indians, who had crossed the Appalachicola, and the Seminoles, and to emigrate the Creeks, if possible. A few of these Creeks are in our possession, but the most of them are still in the swamps of the Appalachicola and Ocklockonne rivers.

On the 25th of June, General Taylor shipped from Tampa, for their new homes, three hundred and sixty-two Indians and negroes, retaining forty-six for runners and guides. The General reports the murder of Hallee Hadjo and four other Seminoles by the Mickasukees, to whom they were sent by General Jesup. In the same month thirty-eight Seminoles delivered themselves to the commanding officer at Fort King. In the middle of the month General Taylor reports the war with the Seminoles as drawing to a close; but that the Mickasukee and Tallahassee bands, with the refugee Creeks, are more hostile than ever. They number between four and five hundred warriors, and are dispersed in small parties over an immense country. In the beginning of June, it was ascertained that a party of Indians had entered the Ockefinokee swamp, in Georgia, and had committed some murders in that State. Five companies of regular troops and one of Georgia volunteers were marched to that quarter to afford protection to the inhabitants, and, if possible, to dislodge the enemy; besides which, the Governor of Georgia, at his suggestion, was authorized by the War Department to call into service a regiment of militia, for the better protection of the exposed settlements. On the 21st of September, the General was visited at Tampa by the principal chiefs of the Tallahassee, with several sub-chiefs, who professed to be anxious for peace, and pledged themselves to come in for emigration by the 20th of October, and to bring in with them their people, and to send runners to the Ockefinokee swamp to get the fugitive Creeks, said to be twenty-two in number, to join them. It was the opinion of the General at that time, that there was decidedly a better feeling among the Indians, as regards emigration, than had been manifested since his arrival in Florida. Early in October, the General repaired to the Appalachicola river, with a view of obliging the Appalachicola Indians to fulfill their promise of removing to the West; and also to take measures to get in the fugitive Creeks secreted in that section of the country. On the 20th of the month, the day stipulated, he succeeded in embarking the whole of the Appalachicola Indians on board of a steamboat for their new homes. He, however, gained no intelligence respecting the fugitive Creeks. On the 30th of October, the General reports from Fort Harlee, on his way to Tampa Bay, that he had received letters from that place which he could rely on, of the most satisfactory character, as to a portion of the hostile Indians coming in for emigration. This information did not prevent the contemplated movements of the troops into the country, and the occupancy of such positions as would tend to hasten the surrender of the Indians still remaining there. Two of the regiments of artillery, and one regiment and one battalion of infantry have been ordered to reinforce the army in Florida, and two hundred and forty-seven recruits are now on their way to Tampa by the Mississippi route. The force in Florida may, therefore, be computed at about three thousand two hundred and forty regulars, and three hundred and seventy militia.

Colonel Lindsay, of the second regiment of artillery, who was in command of the forces assembled in the Cherokee country at the date of my last report, continued on that duty until early in April, when Major General Scott assumed, by order of the War Department, the direction of affairs in that quarter.

The Cherokees were required, by their treaty stipulations, to commence emigrating to the west of the Mississippi on the 23d of May; but it being apprehended that they would not commence their removal at the time stipulated, unless compelled to do so, a strong regular force was assembled in their country and placed at the disposal of General Scott, who was also authorized to call on the Governors of the States interested in the removal of the Cherokees, for such militia force as he might deem necessary, not exceeding four thousand men. The disposition which the General made of his troops was such as to convince the Indians of his determination to enforce the terms of the treaty; and relying on the disposition of the General to oblige them to yield to those terms, as well as on his disposition to protect them in their persons and property, the Cherokees submitted to his direction, and peaceably departed for the country allotted to them in the West, as fast as circumstances would permit.

In the month of January information was received that unlawful combinations of persons on our northern frontiers were forming for the purpose of interfering with the Government of Canada, and joining with the disaffected in that country in endeavoring to subvert the existing government, in violation of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain. It being deemed necessary, on account of these combinations, to send a military force to the frontier to guard against an infraction of the treaty, Major General Scott was directed to proceed to Buffalo, and to take the direction of affairs along the frontier; and there being no other disposable regular troops, the recruits in depot were formed into detachments and forthwith dispatched to the frontiers. On General Scott's arrival on the Niagara he found the line guarded by about sixteen hundred militia of the State of New York, called out by order of the Governor, a thousand of which were received into the United States service; but subsequently, with the exception of a few companies, discharged. With Brigadier General Brady on the Detroit frontier, and Brigadier General Wool on the Champlain and Vermont frontiers, and with the assistance of the civil authorities and the officers of the revenue, General Scott, aided by Colonel Worth and Major Young, was enabled to frustrate every open attempt to violate our friendly relations on the border. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon the officers and soldiers, and others engaged in this service, for their zeal and activity at that particular juncture, and in the midst of the rigors of a northern winter, in the effectual performance of so arduous a duty.

Order being restored about the middle of March, and the militia discharged, General Scott, as before stated, was ordered to take the direction of affairs in the Cherokee country. The regular troops, however, remained on the frontier, in order to check any renewed attempts at crossing the line.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

In the month of June, it was reported that the combinations referred to were still existing, and daily gaining strength, by refugees from Canada joining them, and that they were organizing themselves along the whole line of frontier, and making preparations for further attempts upon Canada; and that a gang of desperadoes had burned the British steamboat Sir Robert Peel in our waters.

On the 12th of June, I was directed by the President to repair to the frontier, there to examine into the state of things, and to use every possible exertion to defeat the purposes of the combinations alluded to. Having ordered such troops as could be collected to proceed to Sackett's Harbor and the Champlain frontier, I set out on the same day, taking Albany and Oswego in my route, and arrived at Sackett's Harbor on the night of the 17th. Immediately after my arrival, I took measures to cause to be published, and widely circulated for general information, copies of the laws of the United States under which I was authorized to adopt measures to repress all hostile acts originating within our borders, against the territory of a friendly Power, and to preserve our friendly relations with Great Britain; and to carry into effect these objects, I issued a general order, dividing the frontier into four districts, to the command of which officers of experience were duly assigned. I found Brigadier General Brady and Lieutenant Colonel Cummings at Sackett's Harbor, but none of the troops which had been ordered thither had yet arrived. I ordered General Brady to proceed to the Detroit frontier, where I deemed his presence most important. A detachment of about one hundred recruits reached Sackett's Harbor a day or two after my arrival. There was a small detachment of New York militia stationed at French Creek, called out by order of the Governor, which I caused to be relieved by the regular troops as soon as a sufficient body of them had arrived, when the militia were mustered, paid, and discharged. The commanding officer at French Creek was furnished with boats to enable him to cruise around the islands in the St. Lawrence. On the 20th of June, an additional number of recruits having arrived at Sackett's Harbor, the steamboat Telegraph was taken into the service of the United States, and a detachment placed on board under command of Captain Gwynne, of the infantry, who was also ordered to cruise among the "Thousand Islands," in search of the gang above alluded to. On the 20th of June, I dispatched an aid-de-camp, with a letter to Sir John Colborne, or the officer commanding the British forces at Kingston, Upper Canada, acquainting him with the purpose of the above-mentioned expedition. My aid-de-camp was directed at the same time, to state to the commanding officer at Kingston that, if he were disposed to fit out a similar expedition, we would cooperate in making a general search among the "Thousand Islands," for the gang of pirates infesting them, which had been engaged in burning the British steamboat Sir Robert Peel. About a week afterwards, the Hon. Colonel Dundas, of the British Army, commandant at Kingston, and Captain Landom, of the Royal Navy, crossed over to see me on the subject of the proposed cooperation, when it was agreed that a similar expedition would be fitted out on their part, and the 2d of July fixed as the day of meeting of the parties. After a search of some days, the haunt of the pirates was discovered, but in the attempt to take the pirates, they all made their escape except two, who were seized. The gang, it appeared, consisted of but eight men at that time, among whom was the notorious Bill Johnson, their leader; they were well supplied with arms and ammunition, and had a fast rowing boat. The two men taken, with the arms of the gang and the boat, were sent to Sackett's Harbor, and placed in the hands of the proper authority, to be disposed of according to law.

On my arrival at Sackett's Harbor, I was informed that great excitement prevailed in consequence of the approaching trial of some prisoners at Watertown, charged with the burning of the Sir Robert Peel, and that the sheriff of the county had written to Lieutenant Colonel Cummings, the commanding officer at Sackett's Harbor, for a guard to prevent a rescue of the prisoners. As soon as the troops arrived, a guard, commanded by an officer, was sent to Watertown, as the sheriff had requested.

Having made all the necessary arrangements at Sackett's Harbor, I visited all the important points on the frontier from that place to Ogdensburg, and crossed the country thence to Plattsburg and Vermont. I found Colonel Cutler with a detachment of recruits, equal to about a company, at Plattsburg, and Major Churchill in Vermont, with about an equal force stationed at Swanton. Everything appearing to be perfectly quiet at that time on the border, after giving the necessary directions, I proceeded to Buffalo, where I was advised by the War Department that three regiments of artillery would be withdrawn from the Cherokee country, and would be disposable for service on the northern frontier; in consequence of which, I issued a general order directing that the first regiment of artillery should occupy the Champlain frontier, the second regiment of artillery the Niagara and Detroit frontiers, and that the recruits mentioned as having arrived on the frontier in the early part of the season should be relieved by those regiments, and repair to Sackett's Harbor, there to join the headquarters of the eighth regiment of infantry, to which they had been assigned; which regiment was to occupy that part of the frontier from Ogdensburg to Rochester, and General Brady to command the troops west of Rochester, within the eastern division, and General Eustis all the troops on the frontier east of Rochester. The remaining regiment of artillery (the fourth) was intended to be left in position in New York harbor, as a reserve, to reinforce such portions of the frontier as might require to be strengthened; but, owing to the want of troops in Florida, that regiment was ordered thither.

After inspecting the Niagara frontier, I went to Detroit and examined the military establishments in that quarter; and, on satisfying myself as to the state of things there, I returned to Buffalo, touching at the intermediate points, and proceeded along the frontier to Sackett's Harbor, and inspected the new regiment under Colonel Worth, with the progress of which, in discipline and appearance, I was highly gratified. After which, I visited the whole line to Plattsburg, and thus having seen that the troops were well posted, and that the officers and men were zealous in the performance of the duty assigned them on the frontiers, I returned to the seat of Government to prepare my annual report.

Since my return to the seat of Government, reports have been received of unlawful enterprises having been made from our border by armed persons who entered Lower Canada, on the Champlain frontier, in the early part of November, who were, however, met and driven back by the British forces, and on their retreat the fugitives threw away their arms, which were collected by our guard stationed near the line; and, also, that another party, which went down the St. Lawrence in boats, had effected a landing near Prescott, Upper Canada; but, after a short time, they were attacked by the British forces and completely destroyed or captured. Colonel Worth, of the 8th regiment, commanding at Sackett's Harbor, hearing of these infractions of the law, promptly proceeded, in the steamboat Telegraph, to Ogdensburg, with a body of troops, taking with him the marshal of the district and other civil officers, and seized the vessels employed in the enterprise, and so interposed as to prevent any further attempts at crossing into that part of Canada.

During the summer it was reported to General Gaines that the Cherokees settled in the vicinity of Fort Gibson had sent runners to the other tribes settled on the western frontier, inviting them to a general council for purposes of a hostile character; and, in consequence, the General, considering it proper to be prepared against any emergency growing out of the council, took the incipient measure of obtaining a mounted force of ten thousand men, and immediately put in motion the Government troops stationed at Fort Leavenworth and Jefferson barracks, towards the place of meeting designated by the Cherokees; but being informed, while on the way thither, that the object of the meeting was of a pacific character, he ordered the troops back to their stations.

I cannot conclude without renewing the recommendation made in my last annual report, in reference to the advantage of having the several regiments and corps effective in officers as well as in men. From age and exposure, officers are liable to become unfit for active service, or, indeed, for any service at all; and, consequently, the officers next in rank to them are obliged to do their duty. I would respectfully submit that officers thus unfitted for service should retire on their pay proper without emoluments, as rations, forage, &c., and that the officer next in rank to the officer thus retired, be promoted to fill his place, with the grade and emoluments of the retired officer, but only the pay of the grade from which the promoted officer was advanced; thus the officer promoted in this manner, who would perform a higher duty, would, during the lifetime of the retired officer, or while he filled his place and performed his duties, although with the pay of a rank below, be compensated by the earlier advanced rank which he would thereby gain, and the superior emoluments attached to that rank. This arrangement would cost the Government not one cent more than the present one; the only difference would be, that the places of the non-effective officers would be supplied by the effective officers doing their duty, and the brevet officers, at the foot of the list, would be sooner advanced. And thus, by the increased efficiency of the several regiments and corps, there would actually a benefit result to the public; and I feel assured that the arrangement would be acceptable and gratifying to many meritorious officers.

ALEXANDER MACOMB,

Major General Commanding in Chief.

Hon J. R. POINSETT,

Secretary of War.

Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, Nov. 25, 1838.

SIR: In compliance with your directions, the following report is made of the transactions of this office for the last year:

The most striking feature of the peculiar relations that the Indians bear to the United States, is their removal to the west side of the Mississippi; a change of residence effected under treaties, and with the utmost regard to their comfort that the circumstances of each admitted. The advance of white settlements, and the consuming effect of their approach to the red man's home, has long been observed by the humane with pain, as leading to the speedy extinction of the weaker party. But it is not believed that any suggestion of the policy now in a course of execution, was authoritatively made prior to the commencement of the present century. Since, it has repeatedly, and at various intervals, received the sanction of the Chief Magistrates of the United States, and of one or the other House of Congress, without, however, any definite action prior to the law passed eight years ago. Treaty engagements had been previously made for their removal west with several of the tribes, but the act referred to was a formal and general recognition of the measure, as desirable in regard of all the Indians within any State or Territory east of the Mississippi. Whatever apprehensions might have been honestly entertained of the results of this scheme, the arguments in favor of its adoption, deduced from observation, and the destructive effects of a continuance in their old positions, are so far strengthened by the success attendant upon its execution, as to have convinced all, it is thought, of the humane and benevolent tendency of the measure. Experience had shown, that however commendable the efforts to ameliorate a savage surrounded by a white population, they were not compensated to any great extent by the gratification which is the best reward of doing good. A few individuals, in a still smaller number of tribes, have been educated, and profited by the opportunities afforded them to become civilized and highly respectable men; but the mass has retrograded, giving by the contrast greater prominence to their more wisely judging brethren. What can even the moral and educated Indian promise himself in a white settlement? Equality he does not and cannot possess, and the influence that is the just possession of his qualities, in the ordinary social relations of life, is denied him. Separated from deteriorating associations with white men, the reverse will be the fact. A fair and wide field will be open before him, in which he can cultivate the moral and intellectual virtues of the human beings around him, and aid in elevating them to the highest condition which they are capable of reaching. If these views are correct, the reflection is pleasant that is derived from the belief that a greater sacrifice of feeling is not made in their removal, than falls to the lot of our fellow-citizens, in the numerous changes of residence that considerations of bettering their condition are daily producing. Indeed, it cannot be admitted to be so great; for while the white man moves West or South, accompanied by his family only, the Indians go by tribes, carrying with them all the pleasures of ancient acquaintance, common habits, and common interests. It can scarcely be contended that they are more susceptible of suffering at the breaking up of local associations than we are, for apart from their condition not favoring the indulgence of the finer feelings, fact proves that they sell a part of their possessions without reluctance, and leave their cabins and burial places, and the mounds and monuments which were the objects of their pride or affection, for a remote position in the same district. For whatever they have ceded to the United States, they have been amply compensated. I speak not of former times, to which reference is not made, but of later days. The case of the Cherokees is a striking example of the liberality of the Government in all its branches. By the treaty, they had stipulated to remove west of the Mississippi within two years from its ratification, which took place on the 23d of May, 1836. The obligations of the United States, State rights, and acts by virtue of those rights, and in anticipation of Cherokee removal, made a compliance with this provision of the treaty indispensable at the time stipulated, or as soon thereafter as it was practicable without harshness. To insure it, General Scott was dispatched to their late country, and performed a delicate and difficult duty, embarrassed by circumstances over which there is no human control, with great judgment and humanity. Early in the past season, several parties had been dispatched to the West, under the direction of officers detailed for that duty, amounting, as is estimated, to six thousand, of whom muster-rolls have not yet been received at this office. The preparations for the removal of those who remained being in progress, John Ross, and other chiefs, in virtue of a resolution by "the National Committee, and Council, and People of the Cherokee nation, in general council assembled," proposed to the Commanding General that the entire business of emigration should be confided to the nation; that the removal should commence at the time previously agreed on, to wit, when the sickly season had passed away, unless some cause, reasonable in the judgment of the General, should intervene to prevent it; that the expense should be calculated on the basis of one wagon and team and six riding horses for fifteen persons; and that the Cherokees should select the physicians, and such other attendants as might be required, for the safe and comfortable removal of the several detachments to their places of destination. This proposal was accepted, on certain conditions, by General Scott, in a communication to the chiefs, (with an exception of such of the treaty-making party as might not choose to emigrate under the direction of John Ross and his associates.) on the 25th of July. To the conditions prescribed they acceded on the 27th, stipulating for the months of September and October to get all their people in motion, and transmitting a resolution of the Cherokee council, conferring on them authority to make the necessary arrangements. The application as to time was answered by saying that the emigration must recommence on 1st September, and be completed on or before the 20th October, with a reservation in favor of the sick and superannuated, who might be unable to travel by land, if the waters continued too low for steamboat navigation, and with permission to such respectable Cherokees as might apply for the purpose to remove themselves on the first rise of the rivers, although it should be after the 20th October. An estimate was submitted by the Cherokee chiefs on the 31st of July, which put the cost of the removal of one thousand souls at $65,880. General Scott intimated that this estimate appeared to be too high, and requested its reconsideration, when its reasonableness was affirmed, a trifling but indispensable article added, and the estimate was thereupon approved. Of their disposition to conduct themselves with propriety, there is evidence in the letter of General Scott to yourself of 3d August, of which I herewith send an extract. Throughout their collection and emigration, so far as this office is informed, the Cherokees have manifested proper temper, and an inclination to do whatever was required, with fewer exceptions than might have been expected, and these not of an important nature. It would seem that the cost of removal, according to the Indian estimate, is high; but as their own fund pays it, and it was insisted on by their own confidential agents, it was thought it could not be rejected. The latest advices give assurances that the last of the Cherokees would be on the road early in November. It has been estimated that twelve thousand will be removed by John Ross and the other chiefs, which, added to the number that had emigrated previously during the year, believed to be about six thousand, will give an aggregate of eighteen thousand Cherokees who have ceased to live east of the Mississippi during the spring, summer, and autumn. It is thought that when muster-rolls of the emigrants come in, the number will be found to be somewhat larger, but at present the above is according to the information possessed. The last annual report of my predecessor made the number of east Cherokees fourteen thousand; but when General Scott had collected the great body of the Indians for emigration, it was computed that there remained, after deducting those who had removed since the above report was made, twelve thousand. Those emigrants being reckoned, as before stated, at six thousand, would make the whole number eighteen thousand a year ago.

A retrospect of the last eight months, in reference to this numerous and more than ordinary enlightened tribe, cannot fail to be refreshing to well-constituted minds. In and previous to May last a large party, led by educated and intelligent chiefs, were dissatisfied and gloomy, discontented with the treaty of December, 1835, disinclined to emigration, and created by their conduct serious apprehensions for the consequences when the day of removal should arrive. It did come on the 23d May; but on the 18th the privilege of wealth and strength to yield what they might withhold was exercised in an act of grace and beneficence by the executive branch of the Government. In answer to a communication from a delegation of the Cherokee nation, then in Washington, the Secretary of War, on that day, informed them that the best efforts of the United States would be put forth to prevail on the States interested in their removal to refrain from pressing them inconveniently, or so as to interfere with their comfortable emigration, and that he was quite sure the exertion would be successful; that the Cherokee agents should remove the nation, if desired, and he would so instruct the general in command in their country, and that he thought the expense of their emigration should be borne by the United States. He promised them an escort and protection while on the way west, and that, as the sum heretofore set apart for the payment of reclamations of various kinds, and to defray expenses of their removal was deemed inadequate for these purposes, a further appropriation would be asked to meet them. This communication met the approbation of the President of the United States, who transmitted it to Congress, "that such measures may be adopted as are required to carry into effect the benevolent intentions of the Government towards the Cherokee nation, and which, it is hoped, will induce them to remove peaceably and contentedly to their new homes in the West." The fruit of this message was the law of 12th June, 1838, giving to the Cherokees the sum of $1,147,067. When it is considered that, by the treaty of December, 1835, the sum of $5,000,000 was stipulated to be paid them as the full value of their lands, after that amount was declared by the Senate of the United States to be an ample consideration for them, the spirit of this whole proceeding cannot be too much admired. The communication to the Cherokee delegation, submitted by the Chief Magistrate to Congress, addressing itself to feelings correspondent with those in which it originated, found in both Houses a ready and willing concurrence. By some, the measure may be regarded as just, by others generous—it perhaps partook of both attributes. If he went further than naked justice could have demanded, it did not stop short of what liberality approved. Thus was the foundation broadly laid for all that has since been constructed upon it. In compliance with his engagement, the Secretary, on the 23d of May, transmitted to General Winfield Scott a copy of the above communication, and authorized him "to enter into an agreement with the agents of the nation for the removal of their people," which produced the arrangement with John Ross and others, already referred to. The natural results of granting so much to the means, to the feelings, and wishes of the Cherokees, followed. If our acts have been generous, they have not been less wise and politic. A large mass of men have been conciliated, the hazard of an effusion of human blood has been put by, good feeling has been preserved, and we have quietly and gently transported eighteen thousand friends to the west bank of the Mississippi.

The Pottawatomies of Indiana, the time for whose removal, by their treaty stipulations, had arrived for some and approached for others, showed an indisposition to comply with their engagements. White men had settled upon the lands they had ceded, and collisions arose that threatened the peace of the country and the spilling of blood, which induced the agent, to whom the direction of their emigration was confided, on the application of the white settlers, to call upon the Governor of Indiana for a military force to suppress any outbreak that might occur. The Governor authorized General John Tipton to accept the services of one hundred volunteers, who raised them and used their services in the collection and removal of the Pottawatomies. A copy of his report to the Governor of Indiana is herewith submitted. By this operation, seven hundred and sixty-eight Indians are now on their way to the West. There have emigrated within the year one hundred and fifty-one Chippewas, Ottawas, and Pottawatomies, one hundred and seventy-seven Choctaws, four thousand one hundred and six Creeks, being chiefly composed of the families of the warriors of that tribe who served in Florida, and who had left their homes prior to the last report, but arrived west since; four thousand six hundred Chickasaws, and one thousand six hundred and fifty-one Florida Indians, making an aggregate of twenty-nine thousand four hundred and fifty-three, which, added to those who had previously occupied their new abode, makes eighty-one thousand and eighty-two emigrant residents, of whom thirty-one thousand three hundred and forty-three are now subsisted at the expense of the United States, at a daily cost of $3,186 24. In the whole number of emigrants, of those for the year and those living at the expense of the United States, are included the Cherokees and Pottawatomies, who, it is supposed, will have reached the end of their journey before this report is presented. There yet are east of the Mississippi twenty-six thousand six hundred and eighty-two Indians. A tabular statement, which accompanies this communication, exhibits in detail the foregoing facts.

Information was received on the 6th November, from the agent employed in that service, by letter dated at Pensacola, on the 28th October last, that all the Appalachian Indians, and thirty-four Creeks, were embarked for the West. Recent communications are calculated to induce the belief that the Winnabagoes will remove quietly in the spring. They concluded a treaty at Washington on the 1st November, 1837, which was ratified on 15th June, 1838, by which they covenanted to leave their present residences for the neutral ground west of the Mississippi, within eight months after the ratification. The day will arrive in winter, and it is understood they wish to be indulged till spring, which seems to be not unreasonable, although the distance to be traveled is short; and I am sure they will be gratified. On the other hand, information of a different character has reached this office, stating that it is uncertain whether they will remove. In any event, I think, the above request ought to be granted.

The number of Indians on this side of the Mississippi is comparatively small, and it cannot be that much time shall elapse before the entire East country will be relieved of their presence—an event desirable in all respects of the subject. It is an expensive operation, but it is difficult to withhold any draft upon the public funds in reference to it. Our great purpose is their peaceable and comfortable translation; and in effecting it, the movement should have a liberal infusion of feeling and humanity, and not be misshaped by narrow rules.

The different treaties providing for their removal, and the act of 1830, entitle the Indians to receive patents for the land allotted to them in the West. To so many of them as are there, would it not be just to give the evidence of title? They will look for it, and would be gratified by its receipt. Few surveys have been made: designation of boundary on the ground might prevent collisions, and is proper. This work should be attended to, I think.

Within the last twelve months, the following treaties, previously made, have been confirmed and ratified, and appropriations made by Congress for carrying them into effect. It is thought proper to notice them particularly, as having been acted on lately for the first time.

A treaty was concluded with the Miami tribe, on the 23d October, 1834, which, having been laid before the Senate with modifications, assented to by the principal chiefs, that body ratified the same with a certain amendment: "Provided, That the chiefs and warriors of the said tribe shall, in general council, as on the occasion of concluding the aforesaid treaty, agree to and sign the same." The amendment was adopted by the Miamies, and the treaty proclaimed by the President on the 22d December, 1837. By this contract a considerable body of land was conveyed to the United States, for which a fair equivalent in money was stipulated to be paid, viz: $208,000, with reservations of land. The United States further agreeing to have their improvements on the ceded ground valued, and to expend the amount in building, clearing, and fencing land for the Indians, on such place or places as they might afterwards select for their residence. An examination into the debts of this tribe, for the payment of which $50,000 were appropriated, is now in progress. The stipulations of the United States in the treaty have been complied with, so far as the time has arrived for their performance.

With the Chippewas of the Mississippi a treaty was negotiated on the 29th July, 1837. By it a cession of land was made to the United States, and we undertook to pay them in money and goods, annually, for twenty years, $31,000; to meet which remittances have been made to the public agents. There are also $100,000 to be paid by the United States to the "half-breeds of the Chippewa nation," under the direction of the President, and $70,000 to be applied in payment of their debts; $58,000 to specific claims, and $12,000 to other just demands against them. Governor Dodge recommends the postponement until spring of the distribution of the $100,000, and the allotment to the creditors of the $12,000. The $58,000 might be paid here on drafts of those entitled; but if necessary to appoint an agent in the spring for other purposes mentioned, perhaps the whole had better be confided to him. There are some minor, and yet important, provisions for the benefit of the Indians, such as the erection of blacksmiths' shops, the employment of farmers, and the delivery of agricultural implements, and grain or seed, &c., which the above gentleman has been asked to suggest the most judicious plan of carrying it out.

From the Sioux of the Mississippi a cession of land was obtained by treaty, concluded at Washington, in September, 1837. Instead of investing $300,000, as provided by the treaty, $15,000 were appropriated to pay the interest, at five per centum. This sum remains in the Treasury, it having been considered advisable not to pay it over until due. This, for a single reason, is, perhaps, most judicious. If the interest is paid in advance, an interval of more than a year must occur between such payment and one that may be made of the interest that shall have accumulated on an investment when convenient to make it; it will be difficult to explain this to the Indians, and dissatisfaction might grow out of it. Commissioners have been appointed to investigate debts and claims of the "relations and friends of the chiefs and braves." To the latter, $110,000 have been appropriated by the treaty, and have been remitted to the proper agent; and the sum of $90,000, set apart for the payment of the just debts of the Sioux, is retained to meet the drafts of the commissioners, in favor of creditors, and until their report is received. The other stipulations of the treaty have been complied with, except those which appropriate, annually, $8,250 to the purchase of "medicines, agricultural implements, and stock, and for the support of a physician, farmers, and blacksmiths, and for other beneficial objects," and bind the United States to supply the Sioux, as soon as practicable, with "agricultural implements, mechanics' tools, cattle, and such other articles as may be useful to them, to an amount not exceeding $10,000," to enable them to break up and improve their lands. The agent has been directed to expend such a portion of the amounts mentioned, as prudence would warrant, for the objects intended; and Governor Dodge and he have been requested to submit a plan for the most beneficial application of the said sums.

The Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi ceded, by the treaty of October 21, 1837, one million two hundred and fifty thousand acres of land. The survey of the land is now making, at the expense of the United States, according to a provision of the treaty. A commissioner has been appointed to examine their debts, and the $100,000 provided for their liquidation retained until his report comes in, which, it is understood, may be looked for very soon. Goods to the amount of $28,500 have been delivered to them according to the treaty; and instructions were given, on the 28th of August, for the execution of the other stipulations for the current year, except as to the interest of $200,000, which has not been paid, because not due. In lieu of an investment of the principal, the interest was appropriated by Congress.

In consideration of a cession of land made by the Sacs and Foxes of the Missouri, by treaty of October 21, 1837, the United States covenanted to invest for their use $157,400, and to apply $3,370 of the interest of it for beneficial objects; to effect which instructions have been given. The money has not been invested, but the interest appropriated by act of Congress. The balance of it, amounting to $4,500, (at five per centum,) has not been paid, because not due. The remaining provisions have been fulfilled.

The treaty made with the Yancion Sioux, on the 21st of October, 1837, has been executed in all its stipulations.

The Winnebagoes ceded their lands east of the Mississippi to the United States, by treaty of November 1, 1837. In consideration thereof the United States agreed to pay, "at the earnest solicitation of the chiefs and delegates" of the nation, $50,000 to certain individuals, which will be paid here; $150,000 for their debts, which may be ascertained to be justly due, and admitted by the Indians; and to pay, under the direction of the President, $100,000 to the relatives and friends of said Indians, of not less than quarter blood. To ascertain the debts, and who are entitled under the last clause, commissioners are now engaged. The payments to be made presently in goods, horses, and provisions, have been attended to. The balance of the proceeds of the lands ceded, namely, $1,100,000, is to be invested, and interest at five per centum guaranteed. The investment has not been made, but the interest has been appropriated by act of Congress. Forty-five hundred dollars of it are to be applied, by the treaty, to education and other beneficial purposes. For the attainment of these and other useful objects provided for, and to be gained when they remove, Governor Dodge has been desired to suggest a plan. The balance of the $55,000 has not been paid because not due.

The stipulations of the treaty made with the Iowas, on the 23d of November, 1837, have been complied with.

The Oneidas at Green Bay, by a treaty made since the last annual report, viz: on the 3d of February, 1838, which was ratified on the 17th of May, ceded all the land "set apart for them in 'the first article of the treaty with the Menomonees, of February, 1831, and the second article of the 'treaty with the same tribe, of October 27, 1832,' reserving to the said Indians "to be held as other Indian lands are held," a tract of one hundred acres for each individual, which shall be so laid down as "to include all the settlements and improvements in the vicinity of Green Bay." The United States agreed to pay to the Orchard party of the Oneida Indians $3,000, and to the first Christian party $30,500. Of the last sum, $3,000 are to go to the erection of a church and parsonage house; and the residue of the $33,500 to be apportioned, under the direction of the President, to those having just claims thereto, the said aggregate having been "designed to be in reimbursement of moneys expended by said Indians, and in remuneration of services rendered by their chiefs and agents in purchasing and securing a title to 'the land ceded,'" and the United States further agreed to have the reservations surveyed as soon as practicable. Instructions have been given for the execution of the several articles.

A treaty was concluded with the Chippewas of Saginaw on the 14th of January, 1837. They ceded several large tracts of land, the proceeds of which the United States agreed should be invested for their use. The fourth article of the treaty set apart $107,543 75 for specific purposes, which the United States agreed to advance; but the third article of the supplement limited the amount to be advanced to $75,000; and provided that the reduction shall be made upon the sums ratably, or in any other manner the President may direct. An appropriation of $75,000 was accordingly made at the last session of Congress; but as it cannot be apportioned until the debts are ascertained, for the payment of which $40,000 were allotted in the said fourth article, $5,000 in money and $10,000 in goods, provided for by the fourth article of the supplement for the year 1838, have only been paid, together with $100 for vaccine matter and the services of a physician, and $200 for tobacco, according to the fourth article of the treaty. The remaining $59,700 will be retained until the report of the commissioner, recently appointed to ascertain the debts, comes in, when a ratable distribution can be made. The Land Office has been requested to hasten the surveys and sales. An exploring party has found a suitable location beyond the Missouri, and the acting superintendent thinks they will soon remove.

These Indians concluded another treaty with the United States on the 23d day of January, 1838, which was ratified on the 2d July, 1838, which relates to the sales of the lands ceded by the treaty of the 14th January, 1837, and to their emigration.

By these several compacts, the United States have acquired eighteen million four hundred and fifty-eight thousand acres of land, for which the sum stipulated to be paid is $3,955,000.

Efforts were made in the years 1834 and 1835, through the agency of Governor Lucas, to treat with the Wyandots of Ohio, which failed of their object. They were renewed in 1836, by John A. Bryan, Esq., who negotiated the treaty of 23d April, by which a part of their reservations were ceded. They still hold a generally fertile tract of country, in extent about fourteen miles long by twelve in width, watered by the Sandusky, and situated in Crawford county, nearly midway between Columbus and the shore of Lake Erie. The extinguishment of the Indian title to this land is desirable. The Hon. Mr. Hunter, representing that district in Congress, and N. H. Swayne, Esq., of Columbus, have had, on the invitation of the Department, various interviews with the Wyandots, and Mr. Swayne has been instructed to negotiate with them on the most liberal terms.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

By the amended treaty of 1834 with the Miami, already referred to, $50,000 were appropriated to pay their debts. A commissioner was appointed to examine them, and it was discovered that, so far from $50,000 being equal to their discharge, they had greatly accumulated since 1834, and amounted to upwards of $200,000. It is probable, that to obtain a fund to relieve themselves from this unexpected embarrassment, they may be disposed to cede a part of their remaining lands.

The Osages, by their treaty of June, 1825, conveyed an extensive tract of country to the United States. The sum agreed to be paid for it was divided and absorbed in various ways, so that not much benefit resulted to them, except the temporary relief afforded by the distribution of money and clothing at the payment of their small annuities. They were poor and destitute, and they plundered our citizens and other tribes. Congress, at its last session, having, for one object, to place the Osages above the temptation to do wrong, made an appropriation for a treaty to extinguish, reads the law, "their title to reservations in lands within other tribes, and for other purposes." The conduct of the negotiation authorized has been intrusted to General M. Arbuckle and Captain William Armstrong, who, in conformity with what was believed to be the wish and intention of Congress in making the appropriation, were instructed to engage for allowances and payments on a liberal scale.

A treaty with the New York Indians has been for some time in a course of negotiation, for their lands at Green Bay. It at one period assumed a shape which induced the commissioner, who was charged with that duty, to accept it; but the Senate prescribed certain amendments, upon the full assent of the Indians to which it was to be promulgated. These changes the commissioner laid before them, with full explanation in council, and obtained the assent of all the tribes, in a manner entirely satisfactory, except that of the largest one, the Senecas. A fuller expression of their willingness to accept the terms proposed was deemed proper and necessary, and the honorable Mr. Gillet, the commissioner, has been requested to lay it again before them, with a view to such consent, if they choose to give it. Should they decline to do so, the treaty, by its own provisions and the resolution of the Senate, will nevertheless be ratified as to the other tribes. When the report is brought in, such course as it makes proper will be taken. I subjoin a part of a report of the commissioner, made on the 29th of December, 1837, which contains some information that may, perhaps, be interesting, respecting these Indians, of whom comparatively little is known out of the region they inhabit.

General Arbuckle and Captain Armstrong have been also charged to treat with the Creeks, "for the purpose of adjusting the claims for property and improvements abandoned or lost, in consequence of their emigration west of the Mississippi."

It has been deemed advisable to attempt a negotiation with the united bands of Ottawas, Chippewas, and Pottawatomies, north of Missouri, for their lands; and Major John Dougherty and Major A. L. Davis have been instructed on the subject.

Under the treaty with the Cherokees, commissioners to value their improvements and examine the debts due by the nation and the individual members thereof have been engaged in the arduous and necessarily protracted duties assigned to them, which have been discharged by the different gentlemen who at various times have constituted the commission, in a manner that is believed to be highly beneficial to the Cherokees. At what time their labors may be expected to close, I have no means of ascertaining; but I have no doubt they will be terminated at as early a day as consists with justice to all concerned.

Anthony Ten Eyck, Esq., of Michigan, was recently appointed, under the fourth article of the treaty with the Chippewas of Saginaw, which provides for the liquidation of their debts, and the ascertainment of the depredations committed by them, a commissioner to make the inquiries preliminary to payment.

Under the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1837, a commissioner was constituted to examine claims for spoliation committed by the Creek and Seminole Indians, in Georgia, Alabama, and Florida. A report of examinations in the two former was made by Messrs. Pease and Smith, in November, 1837, which was submitted to Congress in January, 1838. The hostilities in Florida prevented any action by them in that Territory. It was not thought proper to direct their further progress until the report made was acted on by Congress. When it shall be judged necessary, a renewal of the investigations of the commission will be required, and an enlargement of the law constituting it, so as to extend its jurisdiction to the State of Mississippi, is recommended, that depredations committed by the last Creek emigrants at Pass Christian, or elsewhere, may be examined.

The commission, consisting of Alfred Balch, Esq., and the undersigned, raised under the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, of 1st July, 1836, has lately closed the investigations committed to it. The field to be explored was very wide, and it is hoped the examinations have been as extensive and thorough as, under the circumstances, could be expected. The reports made up to the close of the last session of Congress have been heretofore, by your direction, transmitted to the House of Representatives, and the further reports, since made, will, it is presumed, take the same course. The contract made by certain Creek chiefs with J. C. Watson & Co., provides for the appointment of an agent, to decide between it and such conflicting claims as might arise; the parties, opposed in interest to that deed, called for the appointment of such a commissioner. The person designated for that duty resigned, and a successor will be selected.

The act of Congress of March, 1837, provided for the appointment of three commissioners, "who shall constitute a board for the adjustment and decision of all claims of the Choctaw heads of families, for reservations of land, under the fourteenth article of the treaty concluded with said Choctaw nation at Dancing Rabbit Creek," on the 28th September, 1830. Under this law, James Murray, Esq., of Maryland, P. D. Vroom, Esq., of New Jersey, and P. R. R. Pray, Esq., of Mississippi, were appointed; but the latter having resigned, Roger Barton, Esq., of Mississippi, was selected to supply the vacancy. They assembled in the State of Mississippi, and entered upon their duties. Pending their discharge, the commission, which would have expired by the limitation contained in the law that created it, was extended, by the act of 23d February, 1838, until the 1st August last. On the 31st July, Messrs. Murray and Vroom made a report of their opinions upon two hundred and sixty-one cases, and state that the number of claimants, whose names were filed with them, amounts, according to the lists returned with the report, to upwards of one thousand three hundred; and that "it is understood three are other claims yet to be filed." I would respectfully suggest that further legislative provision be recommended, for examining the claims that have not been investigated.

The performance of the stipulations for reservations, contained in several treaties, is complete in some instances, while in those more important and difficult, and requiring time, they have been only partially executed. Progress in the latter is, however, making, and it is expected that whatever the treaties and law require will be perfected as early as practicable.

The investment of moneys raised by sales of ceded lands, under treaty provisions, or paid for cessions, has latterly been carried to a considerable extent. It is a most beneficial policy, which furnishes an annual resource to those who would as certainly expend the principal in a twelvemonth as the income of the stocks. The funds thus put to interest, under the direction of this office, for Indian use, amount to $1,776,321 76, and yield yearly $92,722 92. The tabular exhibit herewith submitted shows the nature of the investment, how much belongs to tribes respectively, and other particulars, which it may be gratifying to look at. Future sales of lands will increase this source of comfort and supply. It not being convenient to invest some of the amounts agreed to be so disposed of by late treaties, Congress appropriated sums equal to the aggregate of interest that would have accrued according to the rate provided. This is doing full justice to the Indians, until it shall suit the Treasury to set the necessary capital aside.

An act of Congress was passed on the 7th of July last, appropriating $150,000 "for affording temporary subsistence to such Indians west of the Mississippi, who, by reason of their recent emigration, or the territorial arrangements incident to the policy of setting apart a portion of the public domain west of the Mississippi, for the residence of all the tribes residing east of that river, as are unable to subsist themselves, and for the expenses attending the distribution of the same." This sum was "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War." Soon after, viz: on 28th July, 1838, regulations were prescribed for carrying out the intentions of the Legislature, and orders were issued to the proper agents for this purpose. No returns of those entitled to the benefits of this gratuity have been received, but it is, doubtless, in a course of distribution, and the donation will be received by those for whom it was supposed to be designed.

The principal lever by which the Indians are to be lifted out of the mire of folly and vice in which they are sunk is education. The learning of the already civilized and cultivated man is not what they want now. It could not be advantageously ingrafted on so rude a stock. In the present state of their social existence, all they could be taught, or would learn, is to read and write, with a very limited knowledge of figures. There are exceptions, but in the general the remark is true, and perhaps more is not desirable or would be useful. As they advance, a more liberal culture of their minds may be effected, if happily they should yield to the influences that, if not roughly thrust back, will certainly follow in the wake of properly directed efforts to improve their understandings. To attempt too much at once is to insure failure. You must lay the foundations broadly and deeply, but gradually, if you would succeed. To teach a savage man to read, while he continues a savage in all else, is to throw seed on a rock. In this particular there has been a general error. If you would win an Indian from the waywardness and idleness and vice of his life, you must improve his morals, as well as his mind, and that not merely by precept, but by teaching him how to farm, how to work in the machine arts, and how to labor profitably; so that, by enabling him to find his comfort in changed pursuits, he will fall into those habits which are in keeping with the useful application of such education as may be given him. Thus too, only, it is conceived, are men to be christianized; the beginning is some education, social and moral lives; the end may be the brightest hope. But this allusion ought not, perhaps, to have been made; upon it I certainly will not enlarge; it is in better hands. Manual-labor schools are what the Indian condition calls for. The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church has laid before the Department a plan, based upon the idea suggested, for establishing a large central school for the education of the western Indians. Into their scheme enter a farm, and shops for teaching the different mechanic arts. Experience, they say, has shown them, after much opportunity for judging correctly, that separate schools for the respective tribes, though productive of much good, are not so useful as one common school for the benefit of all would be. They assert truly that a knowledge of the English language is necessary, and they think that it can be best acquired in an establishment of the latter description. I would not hazard a different opinion; and yet it may not be improper to state, that the funds which have been set apart for education purposes belong to the several tribes, without whose consent the

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Government could not devote them to a general school; and this the society admits. There is no disposition to discourage the efforts of those who choose to labor in this work of benevolence. On the contrary, there is, as there should be, an eagerness to meet any advance which promises greater facilities for improving the mind and morals of the Indian. Upon success in this department hangs every hope. All that can be done to encourage and cheer on those who have devised this scheme of goodness and charity, I think, should be done. But, whatever reform may be deemed advisable in the direction and economy of the separate schools, it appears to me that if the proposed central school shall be established, they should be kept up too. They may, perhaps, be more numerous than is necessary or advantageous; they may be too expensively conducted, or more scholars ought to be taught for the money expended, or they may be badly located; but each, or all, of these objections may be obviated, and the schools improved. For such minor institutions, would not the central school be able to furnish teachers? Could not the Government, in consideration of any pecuniary aid it might render, exact, as a condition, that a certain number of young Indians of capacity should yearly leave the central school, qualified to be instructors, who shall make compensation for their own education by teaching as long as might be thought a suitable return? After such a plan had been in operation three or four years there would be an annual supply.

The manual-labor system has been advantageously employed in one or two instances, particularly among the Wyandots of Ohio; and by bringing it into general use, better success, it is hoped, may attend the exertions making to impart knowledge to the benighted Indians. Their capacities are represented as not inferior, and yet the different reports made are not very gratifying. There must be some defect in the course adopted, and, it is thought, it may be found where it has been stated to exist; whatever else may be deemed expedient, the connection of manual labor in various shapes with the benevolent toil of instruction, recommends itself by the strongest considerations. Herewith is communicated a statement which gives the information, in possession of this office, respecting the various Indian schools.

The general obligations of the Government to the different tribes, the fulfillment of which is made through the agency of this office, have been attended to. The reports that have been received from the different superintendents and agents, show the general condition of their respective charges. Although here and there your eyes rest on a green spot, the field is generally barren. For those not yet removed, much, if any, amelioration is not to be expected; for the emigrants, everything will depend upon the line of policy that may be adopted. If it be adapted to their condition and wants, and be directed by discretion and wisdom in those to whom its execution may be committed, the most beneficial results may be anticipated. A crisis in their fate has arrived which cannot but make an epoch in their history. The ground is untrodden, and for that reason, together with my own newness of relation to them, the observations already made, and any others which may follow, are submitted with diffidence. The powers and duties of agents, and their permanent assignment to particular tribes, are of long standing. The judiciousness of the latter, it is thought, may be well questioned. Referring not to personal considerations, which are always dangerous ground of legislative or executive regulation, is it expedient to identify the agent with the tribe into which he is sent? Is there not some hazard of his becoming attached to their particular interests, to their customs, to leading men among them, to all that is theirs? The more there is in the agent to esteem, the more likely will it be to happen. If there were but one tribe and one agency, this would be most desirable; but the United States, observing their special treaty obligations to each, intend even-handed justice and protection and improvement, as they owe them to all. With the feelings that have been attributed to these fixed agencies, will not the individuals who fill them become the partisans each of his own particular charge? It cannot be otherwise, and experience must have shown it. In all differences between tribes, wherever there are conflicting interests, or criminations and recriminations, the several parties will find in their attached agents willing and zealous advocates. However this may commend the individual, the Government seeks information from the calm, who take no counsel from their feelings. A dispassionate representation of claims or acts is necessary to just conclusions, and it is not reasonable to expect it from devoted friends. Such, it is supposed, long-continued residence and intercourse will make agents. It is suggested whether it would not be better to allow each of them to reside but a limited time in any one district. By transferring the agents from one position to another, as frequently as may be regarded proper, they will be cut off from the strong enlistment of their feelings, or if, perchance, it will still occur, a removal to another agency will produce kindred predilections elsewhere, and these attachments will neutralize each other. By a general consideration of the interests of all, those of each will be better understood. A general association will liberalize the views, and by widening the horizon, give a look over the whole surface. It might be well to authorize the yearly or semi-annual assemblage of the agents within particular districts, to confer upon the conditions of their several trusts. It may be said that the influence which the Government should hold among these rude beings has been preserved, and can be maintained only through agents; but cannot this influence be ours through others, and if it can, is it not unwise to confine it to our own officers alone? With them it must cease in a state of things which might be supposed. Besides, the traders are licensed; if they are as judiciously selected as they ought to be, might they not be useful in this particular? But the chiefs should be so treated as to make of them fast friends, and their continued presence, under any circumstances, among the Indians, would furnish us advocates when they would be most needed. If, upon full consideration, these suggestions should be adopted, there does not seem to be (for this particular purpose) any change of law necessary, for the act of 30th of June, 1834, providing for the organization of the department of Indian Affairs, "authorizes 'the President, whenever he may judge it expedient, to discontinue any Indian agency, or to 'transfer the same from the place or tribe designated by law, to such other place or tribe as the 'public service may require.'" The superintendency of St. Louis is fixed, by the above law, at that place; it has become an inconvenient location, and should be removed to Fort Leavenworth, or some other point west of St. Louis; but this cannot be done without the interposition of Congress. It is respectfully recommended that the necessary legislation be requested, leaving the place discretionary with the War Department.

The statement of disbursements through this office exhibits a large amount of expenditure. It shows what has been remitted to different public agents, for how much they have sent in accounts, and what proportion remains unaccounted for. This, except as to the amount drawn out, gives no precise information. The disbursements of the agents can be only settled finally in the accounting offices of the Government; and consequently, the balances unaccounted for may be less or more, as the sums expended and vouchers produced may be allowed or not. The statement is made from such information as is on file. However large the amount of the requisitions, they were made to fulfill treaty obligations, and to effect objects most desirable to the Government and the country. I also send a general statement, showing the amount applicable to expenditure, and the amount expended in the service of the department of Indian Affairs, during the year ending 30th September last. The condition of the civilization fund is shown by exhibit 36, and of the treaty funds for education purposes by statement 37, herewith transmitted. As the law now stands, all sums that are not used within two years after they have been appropriated, go into the surplus fund of the Treasury; and, if they are wanted for the original objects, must be reappropriated. It frequently occurs from limitation in treaties, from their having been ratified conditionally, and a variety of causes, that money appropriated for the purposes of this office cannot be used within two years; and a great inconvenience would result, were it not that a practice has prevailed of drawing out such balances as it is thought will be wanted, and which would otherwise fall into the surplus fund. The amount so obtained is placed to the credit of the disbursing agent here, and applied in discharge of the Government obligations. This is, although substantially correct, irregular, and to avoid, for the future, the necessity of such a resort, I think the law ought to be altered, so as to allow three years for the expenditure. This, I hope, if a general change is not thought expedient, may be done in regard of this office, so that no money, except for contingencies, and the salaries of the gentlemen employed in the bureau, shall in future be called for; that is, not paid at the Treasury, on special requisitions, at the time and for the precise object that requires the expenditure.

The disease which was so destructive of human life, everywhere before the discovery of the art of vaccination, has been peculiarly fatal among the Indians during the past year. Their general want of medical advice, and neglect of precautionary measures, added to their irregular and exposed modes of living, made them certain victims to the scourge. It appeared among the Chickasaws, by whom it was introduced among the Choctaws in the west, and, from the wandering disposition of the sufferers, it was extended. Numerous deaths occurred, notwithstanding every exertion was made to confine the disease, and prevent their association with the well; but by the early and diligent use of vaccine matter, much was done in this quarter to arrest the ravages of the disorder. It was, however, in the northwest that the greatest amount of human life was extinguished, among the more savage and unsettled tribes. It is computed that, among the Sioux, Mandans, Ricaras, Minnetarees, Assinaboines, and Blackfeet Indians, seventeen thousand two hundred persons sunk under the small-pox. In at least one other tribe it is known to have prevailed, but no attempt has been made to count the victims, nor is it possible to reckon them in any of these tribes with accuracy; it is believed that if the above number was doubled, the aggregate would not be too large for those who have fallen east of the Rocky Mountains. Whether it reached beyond them is unknown. But vaccine matter was sent by a gentleman, who was traveling to the Columbia river region, with a request that he would endeavor to introduce it there. On this side, and where the malady prevailed so extensively, every exertion was used to vaccinate as generally as possible, and a physician was dispatched for the sole purpose, under the direction of this office, while the pestilence was at its height. The intrinsic difficulties attending such efforts are apparent; still, it is believed much prevention was effected and good done. The medical gentleman employed on this benevolent errand vaccinated about three thousand persons.

The removals west make a new organization of the superintendencies and agencies advisable. I have already submitted some observations in favor of their mutual transfer, and if they remain as the law of 1834 arranged them, the executive power, as heretofore remarked, is, perhaps, sufficient for the purpose. If, however, the change alluded to should take place, it would be proper to reenact the authority, with specific legal provisions as to compensation and the bonds for performance of duty. Some regulation as to the disbursing agents will also be expedient. By the law of the 5th July last, officers in the line of the Army cannot be employed on this duty after the 5th July next. Officers of the staff may, it is presumed, render this service; none would do it more efficiently or faithfully. The only objection to them is that military exigencies might call them away.

There is one measure that, in my judgment, is of great importance; it has heretofore attracted the attention of Congress, and I hope will meet with favor. As any plan for the government of the western tribes of Indians contemplates an interior police of their own in each community, and that their own laws shall prevail, as between themselves, for which some of their treaties provide, this, as it seems to me, indispensable step to their advancement in civilization, cannot be taken without their own consent. Unless some system is marked out by which there shall be a separate allotment of land to each individual whom the scheme shall entitle to it, you will look in vain for any general casting off of savageism. Common property and civilization cannot coexist. The few instances to be found in the United States and other countries of small abstracted communities, who draw their subsistence and whatever comforts they have from a common store, do not militate against this position. Under a show of equality, the mass work for two or three rulers or directors, who enjoy what they will, and distribute what they please. The members never rise beyond a certain point, (to which they had reached, generally, before they joined the society,) and never will while they remain where they are. But if they should, these associations are so small and confined as to place their possessions in the class of individual estates. At the foundation of the whole social system lies individuality of property. It is, perhaps, nine times in ten the stimulus that manhood first feels. It has produced the energy, industry, and enterprise that distinguish the civilized world, and contributes more largely to the good morals of men than those are willing to acknowledge who have not looked somewhat closely at their fellow-beings. With it come all the delights that the home expresses; the comforts that follow fixed settlements are in its train, and to them belongs not only an anxiety to do right, that those gratifications may not be forfeited, but by industry, that they may be increased. Social intercourse, and a just appreciation of its pleasures result, when you have civilized, and, for the most part, moral men. This process, it strikes me, the Indians must go through before their habits can be materially changed, and they may, after what many of them have seen and know, do it very rapidly. If, on the other hand, the large tracts of land set apart for them shall continue to be joint property, the ordinary motive to industry (and the most powerful one) will be wanting. A bare subsistence is as much as they can promise themselves. A few acres of badly-cultivated corn about their cabins will be seen, instead of extensive fields, rich pastures, and valuable stock. The latter belong to him who is conscious that what he plows is his own, and will descend to those he loves; never to the man who does not know by what tenure he holds his miserable dwelling. Laziness and unthrift will be so general as not to be disgraceful; and if the produce of their labors should be thrown into common stock, the indolent and dishonest will subsist at the expense of the meritorious. Besides, there is a strong motive in reference to ourselves for encouraging individual ownership. The history of the world proves that distinct and separate possessions make those who hold them averse to change. The risk of losing the advantages they have, men do not readily encounter. By adopting and acting on the view suggested, a large body will be created, whose interest would dispose them to keep things steady. They would be the ballast of the ship.

Plans have at various times been proposed for a confederation of the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, embracing those who shall hereafter remove. I incline much to doubt the expedience of such a measure. It could only be executed with the consent of the tribes that might become members of it. The Choctaws have twice signified their disinclination to it. The treaty with the Cherokees of December, 1835, discourages it. The idea of such a bond between dependent communities is new. The league could only be for regulation among themselves, and not for mutual protection, which is the usual object of such combinations. They have no common property to secure, or common interest to advance. Any plan I have seen is based upon the power of the President to reject their articles of association, which exhibits strikingly their true position. They may be likened to colonies, among whom a confederation does not exist. They are governed, and their legislation, by each community for itself, is supervised and controlled by the parent country. When they contemplate a different attitude, they confederate. A general council of the Indians might pass resolutions of a pacific character, or to arrest actual hostilities, and to regulate their intercourse with each other; but this could be done better by Congress, leaving to each tribe the management of its own internal concerns, not interfering with treaties or laws. There are inherent difficulties in the dissimilar conditions of the tribes. Some of them are semi-civilized, others as wild as the game they hunt. Some are rich, others poor. Some number but a few hundred souls, others more thousands. We cannot frame for them, much less could they do it, articles of confederation which would bring into council a just representation of the different tribes. If you allot so many representatives to a tribe, looking to its population, the smaller would be swallowed up in the larger. If you limit to a certain number, or within or between two numbers, you are unjust to the larger tribes, which a combination of the smaller, with fewer motives to rectitude, might control. A small proportion of all might come into the confederation, and these separated from each other by bands who would not join in the arrangement, and would not on any principle be bound by the resolves of the general council. We owe duties to ourselves. Cogent reasons for not giving to these neighboring communities more concentration than they have, must be seen. While they are treated with all kindness, tenderness even, and liberality, prudential considerations would seem to require that they should be kept distinct from each other. Let them manage their internal police after their own views. One or more superintendents, and as many agencies as may be deemed proper, with such regulation of their intercourse with each other, and such guards for their protection, as Congress shall think fit to prescribe, would, it appears to me, meet the emergency. Through the officers thus stationed among them they could make their complaints known and ask redress for grievances, which would be afforded when it was proper. It is not understood that the deliberations of the council could result in any act which would be valid until approved by the Chief Magistrate, which does not lessen the force of what has been said.

It would perhaps be judicious not to pay a compliment at some hazard, especially where it would not be appreciated, but to assert directly for general purposes the authority which actually exists, and which must, upon any suggestion that may be adopted, be really felt and acknowledged. At some future period, if circumstances should be so changed as to call for a territorial government, or for any other alteration in the system, the United States can, in the guardian position they occupy, make such modification as sound judgment and an anxious desire to benefit the Indians shall dictate.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

Report of the Acting Quartermaster General.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON CITY, November 28, 1838.

SIR: In obedience to your instructions, I have now the honor to report the operations of the Quartermaster's Department during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of September last.

The annual report from this office of 1837, exhibits the expenditures, in part, of the third quarter of that year, as well as the aggregate balance remaining in the hands of the officers and agents of the department at the close of that quarter, amounting to..... $605,042 19

To which is to be added the remittances made to those officers and agents in the fourth quarter of 1837.....1,162,783 83

In the first quarter of 1838..... 609,214 93
In the second quarter of 1838.....2,152,594 35
In the third quarter of 1838..... 988,943 21

4,913,536 32

And also the funds derived from sales of public property, which became unfit for service, or no longer required for public use, and from rents of public grounds and buildings not occupied for military purposes..... 87,760 11

Making the sum to be accounted for of..... 5,606,338 62

From which is to be deducted the sums disbursed in the fourth quarter of 1836, and second and third quarters of 1837, the accounts for which were received subsequent to the 30th of September, 1837..... $362,641 03

In the fourth quarter of 1837.....1,261,277 49

In the first quarter of 1838.....1,139,794 22

In the second quarter of 1838.....1,460,839 25

In the third quarter of 1838, so far as the accounts have been received at this date.. 560,243 91

And by the several payments into the Treasury, and warrants rendered unavailable, 624 23

Making whole amount accounted for during the fiscal year..... 4,785,420 15

And leaving in the hands of the officers and agents of the Department, to be hereafter accounted for.... $820,918 49

The general correctness and punctuality with which the officers of the Department, as well as those of the line of the army acting in the Department, have heretofore rendered their accounts, justifies the belief that the several balances in their hands will, in due time, be satisfactorily accounted for.

The assignment to the Topographical Department of the duties connected with surveying and opening the several roads authorized by Congress, (except such as are strictly of a military character,) which have hitherto devolved upon the Quartermaster's Department, enables me to confine my remarks relative to this branch of the public service to the operations connected with the "western frontier military road."

Measures were taken, early in the season, for completing the surveys and for opening portions of this road, which was, with the view of facilitating operations, divided into three sections. That part of it commencing at Fort Towson, its southern extremity, and extending to Fort Smith, constituting the southern; from Fort Smith to Fort Leavenworth, the middle; and from the last-mentioned point to Fort Snelling, at the mouth of the Saint Peters, the northern section.

The surveys of the middle section were completed in the autumn of last year; and that part of it extending from Fort Leavenworth south, to the Marais de Cygne, has been put under contract, and the work of opening and grading has been commenced by the contractors.

From the commissioners appointed to locate the other sections, final reports have not yet been received. No doubt, however, is entertained that the work intrusted to them will be completed before the close of the present season.

The site selected for the new military post to be established near old Fort Smith, on the Arkansas, has been purchased, agreeably to a resolution of

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Report of the Surgeon General.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Congress of the 4th of April last; and, in that month, Major Thomas, of the Quartermaster's Department, was charged with the construction of the contemplated work, and proceeded immediately to the scene of operations, accompanied by a corps of mechanics and laborers, and provided with ample supplies for its rapid prosecution. Owing, however, to unusual difficulties in the navigation of the Arkansas, caused by the low stage of its waters, it was not until a considerable part of the season for active operations had elapsed, that his party and supplies arrived at their destination; since which he has been actively engaged in collecting and preparing materials, and in making other necessary arrangements for executing the duties which have been assigned to him.

The progress made, during the past season, in the work of enlarging and repairing the quarters at Fort Leavenworth, and in the erection of stables rendered indispensably necessary by the increase of the dragoon force stationed at that post, has been entirely satisfactory; but the further prosecution of it must be suspended, unless Congress shall think proper to make the appropriations required for its completion.

The measures directed by the War Department, during the last summer, for the preservation of our neutral relations and the security of our northern borders, have necessarily involved heavy expenditures connected with the movement of troops and transportation of supplies, and for the indispensable repairs of the lately unoccupied and dilapidated works along the Canadian line, as well as for the construction and rent of barracks and quarters at the several newly-established posts on that frontier.

Although the operations and responsibilities of the Department have been greatly extended by the recent augmentation of the military forces of the country, and the multiplication of posts along our extensive inland frontier, it is believed that, with the late increase of its numerical strength, the Department will be found adequate, provided its officers be confined to their appropriate functions, to the efficient discharge of its numerous obligations.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, your obedient servant,

HENRY STANTON,
Colonel, Acting Quartermaster General.
Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War, Washington.

Report of the Surgeon General.

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE, }
November 10, 1838. }

SIR: In obedience to your instructions, that I should make a statement of the fiscal transactions and other operations of the Medical Department of the Army, I have the honor to present to you the following report.

The medical and hospital supplies required for the military service within the past year, were furnished in due time, in good order, and of the best quality; and they have been very generally accounted for in a satisfactory manner by the returns of the surgeons and assistant surgeons of the Army proper, and by the returns or statements of the private physicians, temporarily employed in the military service of the United States.

The amount of the appropriation for the medical and hospital department remaining in the Treasury on the 30th September, 1837, was ..... $28,615 07
In the hands of disbursing agents.... 8,110 94
And the sum appropriated by the act of the 6th of April, of the present year, was..... 39,225 00

Making a gross amount of..... $75,951 01
Of this sum there has been paid during the fourth quarter of 1837, and the first, second, and third quarters of the present year, at the Treasury:
On account of the pay and other claims of private physicians... $12,925 47
On account of medical and hospital supplies..... 3,621 56

And by disbursing agents for medical and hospital supplies, during the same period ..... 15,327 74

Amounting, in all, to..... $31,874 77

Leaving a balance, on the 30th September, 1838, in the hands of disbursing agents ..... $3,308 20
And in the Treasury..... 40,768 04

Total..... $44,076 24

There has also been drawn, within the past year, by special requisitions on the Treasury, the following sums:

From the appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities..... $10,900 00

Of this amount there has been expended in the purchase of extra medical and hospital supplies for the troops in the field..... 9,629 54

Leaving a balance in the hands of disbursing agents, of..... $1,270 46

From the appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier..... $1,000 00

Of this amount, there has been expended in the purchase of extra medical and hospital supplies for the militia in the service of the United States..... 826 74

Leaving a balance, which was replaced in the Treasury, of..... $173 26

From the appropriation for erecting hospitals at the military posts ..... $11,078 62

Of this amount, there has been expended in the erection of an hospital at Fort McHenry ..... 7,532 12

Leaving a balance in the hands of disbursing agents of..... $3,546 50

And from the appropriation for the purchase of sites for marine hospitals on the western waters, &c..... $2,168 75

Of this amount, there has been expended in the payment of the accounts of the agents employed in selecting and contracting for sites upon which to erect the hospitals.. 2,168 75

The whole amount of money received, then, during the last fiscal year, being on account of the appropriation for the medical and hospital department..... $75,951 01

On account of the appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities..... 10,900 00

On account of the appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier..... 1,000 00

On account of the appropriation for erecting hospitals at military posts, 11,078 62

On account of the appropriation for the purchase of sites for marine hospitals..... 2,168 75

Total..... $101,098 38

And the sum of all expenditures, together with the money replaced in the Treasury, during the same period, being—

Under the appropriation for medical and hospital department..... $31,874 77

Under the appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities ..... 9,629 54

Under the appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier..... 1,000 00

Under the appropriation for the erection of hospitals at military posts. 7,532 12

Under the appropriation for the purchase of sites for marine hospitals on the western waters.... 2,168 75

Total..... $52,205 18

There remained, on the 30th September, 1838, in the hands of disbursing agents and in the Treasury of the United States, applicable to future disbursements, the unexpended sum of..... $48,893 20

The number of cases of indisposition which have been under treatment by the officers of the medical staff of the army, during the last twelve months, was 26,053; 24,618 of which occurred within the past year; 1,434 being cases that remained of the preceding year.

Of the whole number of persons reported sick, 24,212 have been restored to duty; 473 have been discharged the service; 29 have deserted; 311 have died; leaving, on the 30th of September, 1838, 1,028 still on the sick report.

The accompanying statement, marked C, however, being an abstract of the detailed reports from the different surgeons in each quarter, will give a better understanding of this subject than I can do by description.

The proportion of sick to the number of persons in the military service cannot be ascertained, as that number varied so frequently in the year by the discharge of one body of troops, and the admission into service of new levies of militia and of volunteers; nor is the proportion of deaths to the number of sick so absolutely known as might be desired, for the reason, that during active operations in the field many of the cases of indisposition were not recorded, while it is to be presumed that the deaths have been accurately stated. Enough, however, has been ascertained from the returns to show that not more than one in eighty-three of the cases reported (a fraction less than one and a quarter per cent.) terminated fatally; and thus to prove that the success of the military surgeons, in the treatment of diseases, bears a favorable comparison with the results of the practice of medicine in civil life.

The law requiring an examination of all candidates for appointment in the medical staff, before admission into the Army, has been rigidly carried out, and the same useful results as heretofore have been realized. During the current year forty-three persons, who had been strongly recommended for appointment, were invited to present themselves for examination before the army medical board, lately in session in this city; twenty-one of whom declined or failed to attend, and twenty-two were examined; and of these last twelve were rejected, and ten passed with credit. From this it will appear that the proportion of successful candidates was larger than formerly; and as it is known that the standard of merit reared by the medical board has not been lowered, but perhaps of late somewhat elevated, we cannot but attribute the comparative increased number of approved candidates to the fact that of late more highly qualified aspirants alone are willing to meet the trial.

The present organization of the medical staff is well calculated to insure efficiency, and, under ordinary circumstances, the number of officers would be sufficient to meet all the requirements of the service. While a portion of the army is in the field, however, and the remainder distributed among the posts along a vast extent of country, we must continue to call into requisition the services of many private physicians.

Delicacy, perhaps, forbids my saying much in commendation of the members of the medical staff of the army; yet I may be permitted to express the confident belief that (with two or three exceptions) no officers of the Government, whether in the civil or military departments, are more zealous in the cause of their country, more prompt to obey orders, or more faithful in the discharge of their various duties. This opinion, I am happy to state, is in accordance with that very generally expressed by their associates in arms of the line of the army. In truth, we have now an efficient corps of talented and experienced medical officers; and as the inducements to enter the army are much greater than heretofore, and the bar to admission into the service without merit is, through the action of the medical boards, complete, we may reasonably calculate on introducing into the army, in each succeeding year, a portion of the very élite of the profession.

It becomes my duty now to state to you, that the clerical duties appertaining to the Surgeon General's office cannot be performed by one individual. When the office was first created, and one clerk awarded to it, we had a small army, with the troops more concentrated than now, a few medical officers, and a still less number of hired physicians. Now, our army is larger, and the troops are much more dispersed over the country; a great accession has been made to the strength of the medical staff; and, from the necessities of the service, growing out of the state of war, a still greater increase of hired physicians is required. The correspondence, simply, of the Department with those numerous physicians, and with the officers of the line of the army, not to mention that on public business with many persons in civil life, will give ample employment to the force now in the office. And if we take into consideration the various reports required from the office, and also the numerous returns, reports, &c., from the surgeons, assistant surgeons, and other physicians employed at the military posts, arsenals, recruiting rendezvous, &c., extended all over the land, which have to be examined and prepared for further action; and superadd to these duties the labor of scrutinizing, adjusting, and finally settling the multiplicity of complex and perplex accounts which are constantly coming in upon the department, it will be evident that, with the present force the business of the office cannot be well done, if it is done at all. I am willing, and so is the clerk, to do all that other men can do. I am ready to undertake whatever man can accomplish; but I cannot perform impracticabilities, and one of these is, to keep pace, with one clerk, with the continuously increasing business of the Medical Department of the Army.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

TH. LAWSON, Surgeon General.

Secretary of War, Washington.

DEFALCATION OF SAMUEL SWARTWOUT.

MESSAGE FROM

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

In relation to the recently-discovered default of SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, late Collector of the Customs for the port of New York.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit a special report made to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, for your consideration, in relation to the recently-discovered default of Samuel Swartwout, late Collector of the Customs at the port of New York.

I would respectfully invite the early attention of Congress to the adoption of the legal provisions therein suggested, or such other measures as may appear more expedient, for increasing the public security against similar defalcations hereafter.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1838.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, }
December 6, 1838. }

SIR: I consider it the duty of this Department to present for your consideration a special report upon the recently-discovered default of Samuel Swartwout, who had been collector of the customs at the port of New York.

The first object will be to exhibit all the important facts connected with the case, so far as they have been ascertained; then to explain the means for detecting such defaults which are provided by the present laws; and, before closing, I shall take the liberty respectfully to offer some suggestions concerning the new legislation which seems to be required for the public security against similar defalcations.

1st. Mr. Swartwout was originally appointed collector on the 25th of April, 1829, during the recess of Congress. On the 29th day of March, 1830, he was reappointed for four years, by a nomination to the Senate, which was confirmed.

About the time his term expired, in 1834, he was appointed again for a like term, which ended on the 29th of March, 1838; and he was not re-nominated, and has not since been in office.

Whilst Mr. Swartwout remained collector suspicions do not seem to have been excited at the Department that he was guilty of any default, unless it may be that the balance of money in his hands, when he was renominated to the Senate in 1834, appeared to be too large, and caused some inquiry in relation to the subject.

At that time, not having been myself connected with this Department, and the present accounting officers of the customs also, viz: the First Comptroller and the First Auditor, not having been in office, I am unable to state with accuracy what then occurred, or what examinations were then made; but it is represented that Mr. Swartwout and one of his clerks came to this city on that occasion, and submitted explanations to a committee of the Senate, which obviated any objections to his reappointment.

During his continuance in office, the statements of his accounts, in a condensed form, were made weekly to this Department, with punctuality, and usually exhibited a balance in his hands, ranging from a mere nominal sum, or nothing, to one hundred thousand dollars. The balance varied according to the season of the year, and the circumstances, which might require large drawbacks to be paid, quarterly settlements to be closed with his subordinates, or a great amount of duties received under protest to be refunded. These claims have always been considered as constituting an adequate reason for retaining on hand a sufficient amount to discharge them promptly. The amount so required at the port of New York is generally very heavy; being, on an average, each quarter, over a third of a million of dollars. The last return made before he left office exhibited $122,977 on hand, which was near $30,000 less than the amount of his official bond. The return sent after his going out of office, which included only the last three days of his term, showed $201,096 of money in his possession. When these returns were received at the Department, it was supposed that, the period of his service having expired, he would have but a small balance of custom-house expenses to defray, no more debentures to pay, and no great amount of duties to refund; and he was forthwith requested by me to deposit to the credit of the Treasurer at least half of the sum represented to be on hand.

In reply, he claimed that certain custom-house expenses remained to be discharged, and that suits had been instituted against him for return duties, which, with numerous protests that had been filed against payments, would be sufficient in amount united with those expenses, to cover the whole balance. He therefore insisted, as a right, on being allowed to retain money sufficient to satisfy those liabilities until the questions in controversy received a judicial decision; and he professed to regard that balance as not too large for the purpose.

Copies of the correspondence which took place on the subject between him and the Department are annexed.

A further inquiry into the case was, however, immediately instituted by me, through the First Comptroller and the Solicitor of the Treasury. It terminated in an impression that the facts and the law, as to suits and protests, might justify a short delay in the adjustment.

But the Comptroller was, notwithstanding, directed to bring Mr. Swartwout's accounts to an early settlement, and to have a prompt payment made of whatever amount should appear to be not in doubt or controversy.

Subsequent disclosures made to the Department in November, excited suspicions not only as to that balance, but a much larger indebtedness; and measures were thereupon taken to have the whole subject thoroughly investigated by the law officer of the Department and the Comptroller, calling to their aid, in the absence of Mr. Swartwout abroad, and under his neglect to offer vouchers for a final settlement, all the lights and assistance which could be obtained, not only here but at New York, and from the books and papers of the collector's office, as well as from those persons who had been associated with him in it, and from his successor.

The circumstances which led to most of those disclosures transpired in the course of preparing the first quarterly accounts of that successor for settlement; and the Department was first indebted for them, in a great measure, to his care and vigilance.

After full investigation, the particulars of Mr. Swartwout's defalcation were ascertained, and a report of the state of his accounts was made by the Comptroller to the Solicitor of the Treasury, and proper legal proceedings instituted to collect the balance appearing to be due. The amount of it as computed on the best data obtainable, was $1,374,119. The legal proceedings were commenced against the principal on the account, and against both the principal and sureties on the last bond, the parties to which are also parties to the former one. For the portion of the outstanding defalcation which accrued during the period embraced by the first bond, but which is comparatively small, another suit will be brought as soon as the proper accounts can be adjusted. Each bond is for $150,000. The sum of $30,000 in money has been paid by his agents since the discovery of the default, and large amounts of property have been taken by the marshal, and likewise mortgaged, as collateral security. How much this balance will be reduced by vouchers hereafter presented and allowed, and how far any final indebtedness may be considered secure, it is now difficult, and indeed impossible, to compute with any great degree of accuracy.

So far, however, as the facts could be ascertained by the Solicitor and the accounting officers, it is feared that the whole amount of the defalcation will not prove to have been less than a million and a quarter of dollars. The security of different kinds which has been obtained is estimated very highly by Mr. Swartwout and some others, so as to be considered by them, with his additional estate in other countries, an ample indemnity against any eventual loss by the Government. But they cannot be regarded by the Department, with the limited information possessed at this time concerning their situation, as equal in value to more than half the claim of the United States. But even this is a mere estimate. The first misuse of the public money by Mr. Swartwout, as collector, appears to have commenced in 1830. A series of defalcations, in various items of his accounts, seem to have followed, and continued through each successive year, increasing constantly in amount, till near the close of his official term. They consisted in withholding a part of the tonnage duties, and a portion of the forfeitures and fines; in not accounting for all the bonds collected, nor all the moneys on hand, held either for office expenses, return duties, or in advance of the adjustment of unascertained duties; and in procuring from the Treasury, under the act of 1834, and similar ones, larger sums for the balance of office salaries than the facts warranted.

These results, so unexpected and painful, have been reached by the Solicitor and accounting officers, only after the most careful examination that was practicable, in the absence of Mr. Swartwout, and after full communication from several of his former clerks, most intimately acquainted with the official course of his business and the real condition of his accounts, and one of whom is understood to be his attorney.

Further particulars are forbore to be detailed, as they are embodied in the reports of the Solicitor of the Treasury and the Comptroller, which were made in the course of their recent examination, and are annexed. It is true that this inquiry has, from necessity, been in some degree ex parte in its character, and that some of the results are liable to be disproved or explained away hereafter.

This Department would be highly gratified if Mr. Swartwout should, in the end, be able to show that the money for which he is accountable does not exceed the $201,096 40 reported by him in the last official abstract of his account as the true balance. It would, also, be much pleased if it should happen, as promised in his letter of the 13th of April last, that "on the adjustment of my [his] accounts, the amount due to the Government will be immediately paid."

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Defalcation of Samuel Swartwout.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

But it is an unpleasant duty to add, that the examination into his supposed defalcations was not instituted on slight grounds, nor legal proceedings commenced for so large an amount till sufficient facts were developed to produce a clear conviction with the accounting officers that the default was of the aggravated character already described.

2. I would next submit a few remarks on the modes that exist, under the present laws, for detecting faults of collecting officers, in order that you may judge whether they are sufficient, or require additional legislation. The first one is merely by a regulation which requires the weekly returns before alluded to, and which was voluntarily introduced by the Department nearly forty years ago. This regulation provides that a summary statement of accounts shall be transmitted each week from the large ports, and by subsequent modifications, each month from the smaller ones. It is made to the head of the Department, and should exhibit a true abstract of the condition of the receipts and payments by the collector during the preceding week. Originally, it is presumed that this return was required more for correct information, and to enable the Department to draw at times for the money on hand, than as a check on peculation; but if the statements in it do not agree with each other, or do not, on their face, exhibit facts that appear probable, or do not balance, then suspicion is excited, and a defalcation, if one exist, can, by further and full examination, be detected. So if the sum retained on hand appears too large for meeting the engagements of the office, a draft can be issued for the amount, or an order given for its deposit, as has frequently been done. If either is not complied with, nor sufficient reasons assigned for delay, the default may then be discovered. But if none of these circumstances happen, suspicion is not excited through those weekly statements. It will be seen, however, that, generally, it is not possible for a default to occur without its appearing on them, unless they are made incorrect through deliberate fraud and falsehood. In the case of Mr. Swartwout, none of these statements since 1830, when his delinquencies are supposed to have commenced, are known to have disclosed any fact tending to excite suspicion of his misconduct; and if money was collected or expended in amounts differing from the face of the abstracts, (as is now believed to have been the case,) it must have been concealed by a series of false returns during the whole period of seven or eight years. Some of those returns, under Secretaries Ingham and McLane, may have been destroyed by the conflagration of the Treasury building in 1833; but none of them now found, whether made under them or Secretaries Duane, Taney, or myself, appear to evince anything calculated to cause distrust of his integrity.

The other mode now in use for detecting defaults in collecting officers, and which is the only one provided by Congress, (except the revising power, in some respects, and at some ports, by the naval officer, hereafter to be considered,) is, through the quarterly settlements that are required to be made by collectors with the accounting officers of the Treasury. Those officers are the First Auditor and the First Comptroller. These settlements are devolved on them alone by Congress, without requiring the vouchers and accounts to be submitted to the head of the Department, or any other officer, either for revision, approbation, or rejection.

In that branch of their official business which relates to the adjustment of accounts, you are aware that it has been long since settled that the Secretary of the Treasury, or even the President, does not possess any legal authority to aid in making the adjustment, or to overrule their decisions.

The acts of Congress on this subject first provide that if a collector neglects to present his accounts and vouchers for settlement quarterly, the balance against him, so far as it can be ascertained, shall be reported by the Comptroller to the law agent, or the Solicitor of the Treasury, for suit; and the neglect be also reported to the President, in order that he may remove the incumbent, if still in office. It is also directed, that if a balance exists on a settlement, and is not paid, the Comptroller shall cause a suit to be instituted for its recovery. Whenever a default of the latter kind occurs, it is therefore considered not only the duty of the Comptroller to proceed with the suit, but it is expected, though omitted to be required in the acts of Congress, that he will apprise the head of the Department or the President of the delinquency which has occurred, in order that the case of such collector, if still in office, may be examined by the President, and a decision made upon the propriety of continuing him longer in office.

It is understood that the Comptroller has always exercised some discretion in respect to bringing actions for balances on hand, by not forthwith instituting suits if the balances be small, or the reasons for retaining them for a time appear to be satisfactory. But if those balances be large, and sufficient reasons are not offered to justify delay, or if the collector's term of office has expired, the Comptroller should deem it a duty to proceed at once, under the law, to enforce the collection of the money due.

Several reasons exist why the accounting officers, for the time being, did not discover the defalcation in this case, or report it sooner to the law officer, and to the head of the Department or the President. Most of them are detailed in the two annexed reports on that subject from the present First Auditor and First Comptroller, in reply to inquiries made by this Department. In some of the reasons assigned there is great weight. The customs collected at New York equal nearly two thirds of the whole amount in all the United States. Difficulties doubtless exist in detecting defaults under the present laws at ports where the business is so large, the accounts are so complicated, and the necessary delays in settlement so great.

The difficulties in making an earlier discovery in this case would seem to have been increased by the custom, which it is understood has long existed in the Auditor's Office, not to make detailed examinations of the bond accounts at large ports, unless it may be when doubts arose in relation to their correctness.

The bonds on hand at one time at New York alone exceeded ten thousand in number. The delay of three months, which is allowed by law to collectors in preparing for settlements, and the false returns which appear to have been resorted to by the collector of New York, in his weekly reports, with a view to prevent suspicion and detection at an early day through those returns, augmented still further the obstacles to a prompt detection.

The death of one of the clerks in the Auditor's Office, who has had the immediate charge of settling the accounts for that port, and the recent change in the head of the bureau, as well as the death of the Comptroller who was in office during most of the period of the default, render it impracticable to ascertain with accuracy all the circumstances and reasons why suspicion was not there sooner excited; but those already enumerated are supposed to have been the principal ones. It seems apparent, however, from the official reports before referred to, that many of the defalcations in this case happened under such circumstances, and were so concealed as to render it difficult, if not impossible, to detect them sooner by the accounting officers under the existing laws; and it is supposed that they could not all have been eventually discovered and exposed, except by the aid of those persons in the custom-house at New York, who were aware of the deceptions practiced.

In respect to the remaining legal check on the collector, and through which his defaults may at times be detected, it consists of a naval officer, authorized at a few ports, and required by law to examine and certify to the various expenditures made, as well as the assessment of the duties collected.

But it appears that the naval officer at New York, if able to perform the task, has not for a long period, or at least during the seventeen years that have elapsed since a circular issued by the Comptroller in 1821, considered it his duty to certify to the expenditures and accounts generally, but only to certain portions of them, and to the correct assessment of the duties.

That circular, unfortunately, tended to remove a check on the collector, in some particulars very essential, and has been repealed by the present Comptroller.

It must also be apparent that the real auditor of the custom-house should be attached to the naval office, rather than that of the collector, as he is now a nominee of the latter, and subject to be neither appointed or removed by the Department or the President.

Thus situated, his statements and acts are liable to correspond with the collector's wishes, and can by fraud almost invariably conceal defaults so as not to be detected by the accounting officers, or even the naval officer.

Some of the new instructions given by this Department to the accounting officers when the default was suspected, and of the various steps which were required to be taken to prevent, as far as possible, similar occurrences hereafter, may be seen in the copies of letters annexed.

I do not flatter myself, however, that these instructions, even if able to be strictly enforced by the accounting officers, will prove successful in wholly preventing the occurrence of defaults; but it is hoped that they will tend to an earlier detection of some of them, should any hereafter happen.

3. A few new provisions made by Congress would add much to their efficacy. Thus, if a further clerical force were authorized by law to be placed in the First Auditor's Office, more seasonable and thorough examination of the bond accounts would be practicable, and would, to all appearance, prove beneficial in discovering defalcations. The same result would apparently happen, also, if the naval officer at such a port as New York were enabled, under the increased labor it would devolve on him, to employ such additional clerks as may be necessary to perform the duties required by law in examining critically, and certifying concerning all the payments at that large port, as well as the assessment of duties. So would it happen in the First Comptroller's Office, if the necessary force were given by Congress to investigate carefully the balances on settlement, whenever large; and when those balances are, on such an investigation, not satisfactorily explained, if they should be required by law not only to be immediately reported for suit to the solicitor, but the suspicious circumstances, and even the amount considered due, be, in all cases, communicated to the President, or the head of the Department.

But by none of these steps would the public, in my opinion, be sufficiently secured, without still other legislation of a general character, most of which has been explained in the last three reports from this Department on the finances. The provision in the act of 12th October, 1837, allowing the collector, instead of the district attorney, to extend the payment of bonds falling due, removed one important check which before existed, in requiring the former to deliver forthwith all unpaid bonds to the latter for collection. On this, as well as other accounts, some new and some rigorous provisions by Congress became still more indispensable, and have been earnestly recommended. But, before considering them in detail, it may be proper to observe that, in point of fact, only a small part of Mr. Swartwout's defaults probably originated subsequent to the suspension of specie payments in May, 1837; and that, after the suspension, when drafts and Treasury notes constituted the principal receipts at New York, till he left office, Mr. Swartwout was still required to make deposits in bank of a great part of any surplus which he ever collected in money. He was not one of the officers permitted to retain money on which it was customary for the Treasurer to place frequent drafts in favor of public creditors, though, since Mr. Swartwout's term expired, and since specie payments have been resumed by the banks, large sums have been collected there in money; and it has been customary, and has been found convenient, to place such drafts very often on his successor. The first new general enactment, not already enumerated, which might, under existing circumstances, be found useful, is the entire separation of all disbursements from the collections at a port of such extensive business as New York.

The attention of Congress was invited to such a measure by this Department in September, 1837, in the following words: "At points like New York, and a few others, where a likelihood existed that the sums would permanently be large, but which, under a reduced revenue and expenditure, would seldom occur, authority might be given to appoint the clerks, now acting as cashiers or tellers, under the collectors and receivers, or other more suitable persons, to act as keepers and paymasters of the public money. But they should be made independent of the collectors and receivers, and placed under the like tenure of office and under suitable bonds." As some further check on the accounts of the collectors, it might be prudent to require, by law, the certificate of the naval officer to the correctness of each weekly return, and to the possession of the balance in money, after a careful inspection of the whole subject. The provision requiring all balances not immediately adjusted to be reported forthwith to heads of Departments or the President, in order that real defaulters may be ascertained and seasonably removed, has been before alluded to, and would be likely, in all classes of officers, whether collecting or disbursing, to increase the public safety. Such reports are now required of the Second Comptroller in respect to certain accounts of war and navy officers, but should be also of both comptrollers, and as to all kinds of balances and officers. The heads of the Departments could then, by comparison with the weekly returns, and other inquiries, sometimes discover delinquencies, which now might escape detection, in the accounting officers. The entire separation of the duties of controlling the settlement of accounts from those of superintending the customs, and making one of the comptrollers a commissioner of the customs, would be likely, as suggested to Congress as long ago as 1835, to render more effective both of these important branches of business. Another useful check on defalcations would be the requisition of cash in payment of all duties. The largest item of deficiency in the case under consideration grew out of the bond accounts; and future defaults could be much better guarded against if the laws required only cash duties. But, after all such enactments to insure checks, and a closer and wider supervision, this Department is satisfied that the most effectual remedies must be those operating directly on offenders themselves. The severest penalties against false returns, and against the loan or embezzlement of the public money by collectors, as well as all classes of officers, and the strictest prohibition against its use in any way for private purposes, with the occasional and rigorous examination of their funds and vouchers by agents or by committees of Congress, in a manner similar to what was recommended by this Department at the special session in 1837, would, without doubt, have the most salutary effect on the security of the Government. By the influence of these measures in preventing wrong, they would also, in the end, often prove acts of kindness, rather than hardship, to the officers themselves and their unfortunate sureties.

Such transactions as that which it has been my disagreeable task on this occasion to report for your consideration, being flagrant breaches of morality, as well as great civil injuries, cannot, in my opinion, be too strongly branded by penal legislation. This could bring no reproach on any of those upright, scrupulous, and faithful citizens who fill stations of public trust. It will prove fortunate, also, for the security of the Treasury, if public opinion should, in relation to such delinquencies, hereafter indicate a much higher tone of mors and a stronger sense of official fidelity and honor than have, unhappily, to some extent heretofore prevailed. I regret, sir, that the facts could not be correctly explained in this case without the use of some language which may appear harsh, but which the circumstances and a due discharge of duty seemed imperatively to require.

Respectfully, LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

P. S. Two copies of recent letters from Mr. Swartwout to some of his friends in New York, in relation to this subject, protesting against the supposed amount of his default, and insisting on his ability to meet any deficiency, are submitted for the President's perusal, but are not made a part of this report, as some of the matters contained in them seem to be of a private character.

Since this report was prepared, I understand that the office of district attorney for the southern district of New York has become vacated, under circumstances which create a suspicion of some connection between the recent incumbent and Mr. Swartwout in the default above-mentioned. I have requested the Solicitor of the Treasury to take all suitable steps to examine thoroughly the state of the accounts of the late attorney, and, if anything should appear to be due, to procure security therefor as far as practicable. As soon as any important results on this subject are ascertained with accuracy, I will communicate them for your consideration.

Reports of the First Comptroller and Solicitor of the Treasury relative to the defalcation of SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, late Collector of Customs at New York.

NEW YORK, November 8, 1838.

SIR: On the receipt of your letter to the Solicitor of the Treasury, of the 5th instant, we conferred together on the course most expedient to be taken in regard to the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, the late collector at New York.

It appeared that the last settlement of his accounts at the Treasury was up to the 31st December last, and that, although he was called upon by the First Auditor, and notice subsequently given to his sureties by the Comptroller, his accounts and vouchers, from that time till the 28th of March, when his term of office expired, had never been furnished. The stated balance against him on the 31st December, 1837, was $9,678,984 56; this, however, was known to include all the uncollected bonds not due, bonds in suit, and various items to which he would be entitled to a credit on a final adjustment. This made it necessary, as the accounts and vouchers were not furnished, that immediate steps should be taken to ascertain the sum really due, as accurately as possible. With this object, we requested Mr. Underwood, who has been charged with the examination, in the office of the First Auditor, of the accounts of Mr. Swartwout, to proceed at once to New York, and from the documents at the custom-house obtain the necessary information for stating the accounts at the Treasury, and ascertaining the true balance for which Mr. Swartwout is liable. He has accordingly done so.

We arrived here ourselves yesterday, and found that Mr. Underwood had been industriously engaged in the necessary examinations. The result has been, so far, to ascertain that the defalcation exceeds $1,200,000. He will continue his labors until he has every fact necessary for making a true account, when he will proceed at once to Washington, and have it duly stated and passed by the accounting officers; which is a necessary step, preliminary to further proceedings. We expect Mr. Underwood will leave here this afternoon.

We have every reason to believe that the security in Mr. Swartwout's official bond is fully sufficient for its amount.

The examination requisite to ascertain the manner in which the money was abstracted, and the details of the defalcation which has been going on for seven or eight years, will require some days. All that we know in regard to it at present, is derived from a voluntary communication made to us last evening by Mr. Henry Ogden, the cashier of the custom-house during Mr. Swartwout's term.

Having been informed that the large defalcation was known to the public officers, and that we had come to New York for the purpose of investigating it, he called on us, and at once, in the presence of Mr. Price, the district attorney, who was with us, entered frankly into a conversation on the subject. He commenced by saying that the circumstances of the case had troubled him exceedingly for some time, and that he had strongly urged Mr. Swartwout not to leave the United States in August last; that he had told him it was scarcely possible the defalcation could remain much longer concealed, especially since the accounts for the last quarter had been called for and not furnished; that he had advised him, instead of going to Europe, to go at once to Washington, submit a statement of the whole matter to the Secretary of the Treasury, surrender his property, and make the best arrangements he could; that Mr. Swartwout told him in reply, he was confident of being able to raise money in England, by which he could pay his whole debt to the United States as soon as he returned; and he did not think the business would be known before that time.

In reply to our inquiry as to the time when the abstraction of the public money commenced, he stated that it was about nine months after Mr. Swartwout was appointed collector. He afterwards said he supposed it might have been a year after—that is, in 1830; that, as the amount of defalcation increased, he frequently spoke to Mr. Swartwout on the subject; and that, about four years since, it had become so large that he told Mr. Swartwout that unless measures were taken to reduce it, he could not consent to continue in the situation he held. Mr. Swartwout was, however, confident that the operations in which he was engaged would be so profitable as to make it easy for him to pay off the whole deficiency. This mode of treating the subject Mr. Swartwout continued to persist in to the last, always expressing his belief that he could set matters right.

In reply to our inquiry as to the mode in which the affair had been conducted, and the amount, Mr. Ogden stated that Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, was more fully acquainted with the particulars than himself, but that it commenced by Mr. Swartwout not passing to the credit of the Treasurer the whole sums received; that the bonds, being placed in bank, were there collected and passed to the credit of Mr. Swartwout himself; and that the weekly transfers to the Treasurer by Mr. Swartwout were usually made on Monday, but did not include the moneys received later than Saturday morning at ten o'clock; by which means the receipts on bonds due on Saturday and Sunday were embraced in the succeeding week; and thus that amount, which often was $100,000 or $200,000, could be kept and used by him; the receipts of the last two days of each week enabling him to make up the previous deficiency, so as to transfer the requisite sum to the Treasurer. The next mode adopted by Mr. Swartwout was the use of the fund deposited to meet unliquidated duties, which was a large one, amounting frequently to $150,000 or $200,000, and was entirely under his control, the deposits being made to Mr. Swartwout's own credit, and subject to his check. To these he added the use of the moneys paid to him on account of the share of the United States in penalties and forfeitures; and he also overdraw the account for fees and emoluments payable to him for himself and the officers of the customs. These were, Mr. Ogden stated, in his opinion, the sources from which Mr. Swartwout retained the moneys, and the mode by which he was able to keep his transfer to the Treasurer apparently correct; but about the years 1836 and 1837, the deficiency had amounted so high that it became necessary, in order to prevent its detection, to use the bonds which were deposited with him for collection; a large amount of them was withdrawn from the usual course, and the amount collected by Mr. Swartwout. From this arises the principal deficiency in the bond account.

In regard to the amount of defalcation, Mr. Ogden stated that in one of his conversations with Mr. Swartwout last summer, he (Mr. Ogden) told him that it could not be less than $900,000, but Mr. Swartwout said he did not think it exceeded $600,000.

In reply to our inquiry as to what had become of the money, Mr. Ogden said that he was totally at a loss to conceive how such a sum could have been exhausted; that Mr. Swartwout had been a large speculator in stocks for several years, and that he had known his operations in them to amount to some hundred shares a day; that he had been a loser for a large sum by the failure of the Josephs, to whom he knew of his actually loaning $25,000 a day or two before their failure; that he had made immense purchases of lands in Texas; and that he also had heavy interests in the Cumberland coal lands. It did not appear, however, that Mr. Ogden could account for an expenditure so large as the ascertained defalcation.

In reply to our inquiry as to Mr. Swartwout's property, Mr. Ogden stated his inability to give a particular account of it. He said that the funds in bank, known to him, did not exceed $29,000; that there was a house in this city; land at Hoboken, on which there was an incumbrance of about $50,000, but which he thought worth $100,000 more; that there was, besides, some land in Illinois, the Cumberland property, and the property in Texas.

Mr. Ogden then stated that he had a full power of attorney from Mr. Swartwout, under which he was desirous to act, as, under the circumstances of the case, he thought his duty required, and Mr. Swartwout himself could not object to. He stated that probably Mr. Swartwout would return in the steamship expected next week; that he had written urging him to do so, especially on his being apprised that the sureties had received notice from the Comptroller that the accounts had not been rendered; that, although he had no direct account of his intention to return, he thought it most probable he would do so. He assured us that, in the mean time, no measures should be taken under his power of attorney to interfere with the claims of the United States; and he finally agreed to transfer to them, under that instrument, the property of Mr. Swartwout, and offered to meet us on the following day for that purpose, at the office of the district attorney.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. N. BARKER,
H. D. GILPIN.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

NEW YORK, November 10, 1838.

SIR: Since the joint report of the Comptroller and myself, on the 8th instant, the investigations into the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, and the steps which seemed expedient in relation to it, have been continued without intermission. They have proved very laborious, and in no degree tended to lessen the amount of the deficiency, or change the character of the transaction.

All the abstracts, vouchers, and other documents, relating to the collector's account for the first quarter of 1838, (being the last of Mr. Swartwout's term,) which had never been furnished, have been now transmitted to the First Auditor. These documents, however, want the signature of Mr. Swartwout, though prepared by the officer who transacted that branch of his official business. The cause of their being thus incomplete appears to have been the desire of Mr. Swartwout that they should not be furnished to the accounting officers until his return from abroad. By that time, according to the statements of Mr. Ogden, he hoped to be able to make arrangements for the settlement of the whole defalcation. The want of them, however, delayed the present collector in the completion of his own accounts, as it was necessary to include therein an accurate statement of the balances in cash and uncollected bonds, handed over by Mr. Swartwout, and that the same should agree with the final accounts of the latter, as rendered to the Treasury Department. The urgent demand for this, made by the present collector upon the officer having charge of these accounts, and the difficulty of obtaining it, first led to the suspicions communicated by him to the Department, which were rendered more certain by the subsequent examinations he immediately instituted.

Mr. Underwood completed, on Thursday evening, the examination of the books and documents at the custom-house, so far as to enable him, with the addition of the information already possessed at the Treasury, to state the account of Mr. Swartwout so as to exhibit truly the amount due to the United States. He then proceeded to Washington for the purpose of having the account finally adjusted and passed by the accounting officers, as the act of Congress requires, and expected to return it to me, at this place, duly certified, by the 12th instant. When it is received, we shall be able to adopt the summary proceedings by distress warrant, authorized by the act of May 15, 1820, should the interests of the United States make that course most advisable.

It appeared proper, however, without waiting for this, to take whatever measures were possible for the immediate security of the United States. On examining the letter of attorney from Mr. Swartwout to Mr. Ogden, I found that it conferred on the latter the fullest agency. He was entirely impressed with the propriety of adopting under it such measures for the security of the United States as were in his power. He has paid over to me the sum of $30,000 in cash, being the deposit in bank referred to in the last report. This sum I have placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, on special deposit, in the Bank of America, and herewith inclose you duplicate receipts of the cashier therefor. Mr. Ogden has also executed, as the attorney of Mr. Swartwout, three mortgages of all his property in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Maryland. The specific portions of property belonging to Mr. Swartwout in those States were not all known to Mr. Ogden, but they are described as fully as his information permitted; and the mortgages embrace, generally, all Mr. Swartwout's estate. Neither Mr. Price nor myself have been able to learn that there is any other property, real or personal, unless it be the household furniture. The mortgages have been placed for record in the register's office of this city, and of Bergen county, New Jersey; and I have forwarded that embracing the property in Maryland, to the district attorney there, with a request to have it recorded in the proper office without delay. These mortgages include the house and lots in this city; the large and valuable meadow property at Hoboken; and the interest in the coal lands at Cumberland. As to their value, I have no means of forming an opinion, but it is rated by Mr. Ogden at a very large amount.

The investigation into the details of this defalcation is necessarily very difficult and tedious. Eight or nine years have elapsed since it commenced. The books and accounts through which it is to be traced are numerous, as it was carried on through the various periods when the public moneys were collected and kept in the branch Bank of the United States, the selected deposit banks, and by the collector himself. The different classes of revenue received, which, as was stated in our last report, were successively resorted to at different periods, multiply the researches into the general accounts, which are of vast complexity and amount; and the false statements and other entries in regard to these transactions, made with a view to give the appearance of correctness to the official returns, and prevent discovery, increase the present difficulty. From Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier during Mr. Swartwout's official term, we received a verbal statement, confirming that previously made to us by Mr. Ogden; and, in a written communication, he has given a general view of the course of proceeding, to which he has offered to add such a particular account of the details of the transactions as he can gather from the books and accounts. When Mr. Underwood returns here, I hope that his knowledge of such accounts and his great industry and accuracy may enable him to trace out the whole of this complicated proceeding, step by step, from the beginning to the close.

I will forward to you, as soon as they can be prepared, copies of the written statements of Mr. Ogden and Mr. Phillips; of the letter of attorney of Mr. Swartwout to Mr. Ogden; and of the three mortgages of Mr. Swartwout's property.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. D. GILPIN.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

NEW YORK, November 13, 1838.

SIR: Yesterday I received a duly certified transcript of the account of Mr. Swartwout, as finally stated by the accounting officers, showing a balance due from him, as late collector of the revenue for the port of New York, of $1,344,119 65.

In pursuance of the provisions of the act of 15th May, 1820, I forthwith issued a warrant of distress against the said Samuel Swartwout, and Benjamin Birdsall, Charles L. Livingston, and Mangle M. Quackenboss, the sureties in the official bond of Mr. Swartwout, which was forwarded from the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. The warrant of distress, with a copy of the account, was delivered to the marshal, and he proceeded without delay to make a levy on the estate of Mr. Swartwout and his sureties in this district.

In order to perfect the lien in the manner the act requires, the marshal has already caused the levies he has made, with the dates, to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the district court for this district, and will continue so to do as additional property may be ascertained.

Although the parties are resident in this district, yet as the act of Congress contemplates the issue of different warrants where the estate intended to be taken and sold is situate in different districts, I have issued one to the marshal of Maryland, and another to the marshal of New Jersey, and I have directed the most rigid scrutiny to ascertain the property that can be levied on. The only account of any in either State that I have been able to obtain is that embraced in the two mortgages to the United States, referred to in my last report; but it is supposed there may be other property or interests in some companies, incorporated or unincorporated. At all events, a more full description of that and all other will be obtained and embraced in the return and record of the levy, so as to make the security of the United States more complete than under the mortgage.

Under the distress warrant here, the marshal is causing the most careful search to be made for the purpose of discovering whether there are any moneys or stocks belonging to Mr. Swartwout of which we have not been heretofore informed. So far, it does not appear that there are; and the general impression seems to be, that he is not possessed of any such property. It is among the most remarkable circumstances in this case that so little should, apparently, remain out of such a vast amount of money.

The return of Mr. Swartwout by the steamship is still looked for. She has not arrived, but is hourly expected.

In my last report I stated to you the circumstances which rendered it a work of extreme difficulty and delay to trace the details of this long-continued defalcation. Since the return of Mr. Underwood yesterday, and his ability (now that the statement of the account is completed) to devote his attention exclusively to this branch of the case, considerable progress has been made. The general system by which the money was abstracted, and the deficiency concealed, has been already stated to you, as derived from the information of Mr. Ogden and Mr. Phillips, confirmed by the examinations of the Comptroller and myself. I now, however, feel satisfied that we shall be able to trace out the whole proceedings, so as to show exactly the times, amounts, and modes, in which the various sums of money were respectively taken.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. D. GILPIN.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

NEW YORK, November 15, 1838.

SIR: We have completed, with the aid of Mr. Underwood, the examination of the records of the

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Defalcation of Samuel Swartwout.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

custom-house at this place. From them, with the information derived from Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, we have ascertained, as we believe correctly, the sums withdrawn by Mr. Swartwout from the public moneys under his charge, during each successive quarter of his official term, and never replaced. A summary statement, exhibiting this in detail, has been drawn out by Mr. Underwood, and is among the documents transmitted to you herewith.

The amount, as settled at the Treasury on the 10th instant, exhibits a balance due from Mr. Swartwout, exclusive of interest, of $1,344,119 65. It is supposed that a further adjustment of his accounts, and the production of the formal and necessary vouchers for sums for which he may be entitled to credit, will authorize a further allowance of $148,413 96. This will make the sum with which he is chargeable $1,225,705 69, exclusive of interest. This is the amount that he appears to have withdrawn and never replaced.

According to the statement of Mr. Ogden and Mr. Phillips, heretofore mentioned to you, and subsequently confirmed by them in writing as well as verbally, the use of the public money commenced as early as the close of 1829, or the beginning of 1830; the practice being to transfer at the commencement of the week, to the Treasurer of the United States, no more than the amount received previous to Saturday morning; and thus to replace successively from the subsequent receipts the sums withdrawn, so that the deficiency might not appear. Though the sums thus replaced after they were taken, can form no part of the balance now charged against Mr. Swartwout, which consists only of sums never returned, yet we endeavored to obtain from Mr. Phillips the items of this sort from the commencement. We were unable to do so. The original check-book of Mr. Swartwout from June, 1830, to December, 1831, through which, perhaps, they might have been traced, was not, after diligent search, to be found; and although Mr. Phillips commenced, as he stated, in the year 1834, when the deficit began to be large, to make a memorandum by which he can now designate the sums withdrawn subsequent to that period by Mr. Swartwout, from the cash fund for his own use, yet he declared his inability to do so any earlier. The evidence, therefore, in regard to the moneys that were withdrawn and replaced, is found in the verbal communications made to us by Mr. Ogden and Mr. Phillips, which were given in our previous reports to you, and in their letters and written statements, of which copies will be found among the documents transmitted to you herewith.

We have ascertained that the $1,225,705 69 taken by Mr. Swartwout and not replaced, increased gradually, from the first quarter of 1830 to the end of the first quarter of 1838, when his official term expired, and that it was drawn from various funds.

The deficit of Mr. Swartwout, at the end of each successive year, was as follows:

On the 31st December, 1830.....	$622 34
On the 31st December, 1831.....	1,168 87
On the 31st December, 1832.....	30,801 33
On the 31st December, 1833.....	35,298 54
On the 31st December, 1834.....	50,370 04
On the 31st December, 1835.....	137,061 69
On the 31st December, 1836.....	336,718 69
On the 31st December, 1837.....	1,016,955 32
On the 28th March, 1838.....	1,225,705 69

The "tonnage duty" is the first fund in which the deficit exists. It amounts in the aggregate to $2,271 39. Of this there occurred in the year 1830, $622 34; in the year 1831, $546 33; in the year 1833, $823 17; in the year 1835, $279 35. None of these sums are found to be debited in the cash account of Mr. Swartwout. In the year 1836, however, there is a debt to that account of $488 15, for correction of errors, leaving the whole amount of tonnage duty received and unaccounted for, $1,783 24. It may be that this deficit has arisen from errors which have crept into the account during the five years through which it extends. The amount is so small as to give color to this supposition.

The "forfeitures and penalties" belonging to the United States constitute the second fund in which there is a deficit. It amounts in the aggregate to $39,823 12.

Of this there occurred—

In the year 1832, the sum of.....	$29,632 46
In the year 1833, the sum of.....	3,674 04
In the year 1834, the sum of.....	1,173 09
In the year 1835, the sum of.....	5,343 53
	<hr/> $39,823 12

By the provisions of the 89th section of the act of 2d March, 1799, the collector is to receive from the court all sums received on account of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, for a breach of the revenue laws, and he is to account for them quarterly to the Treasury. The sum above stated belonged to the United States, as their portion of various penalties and forfeitures, and was received by Mr. Swartwout under the above provision. It was not, however, debited in his own cash account; and though admitted in his accounts rendered to the Treasury, it has never been paid over.

Three "Treasury warrants," amounting in the aggregate to $39,240 05, were received by Mr. Swartwout during the years 1834 and 1835. They were for the following sums, respectively:

1834, August 23, No. 9,677.....	$7,637 21
1835, May 2, No. 837.....	21,895 15
1835, June 22, No. 993.....	9,707 69
	<hr/> $39,240 05

Mr. Swartwout received these warrants under the authority of the 2d section of the act of 27th June, 1834, to make up an alleged deficiency in the fees and emoluments of his office to meet the compensation due to his clerks. Their receipt appears by his books, but the proceeds have never been debited in his cash account, and their whole amount still remains entirely unaccounted for.

Cash was withdrawn for the alleged purpose of paying the expenses of the office, beyond the actual amount of these expenses, as exhibited by Mr. Swartwout's own accounts and vouchers. The aggregate of this excess is $60,291 42. The application of this fund commenced in the third quarter of 1835, and extended down to the last quarter of his official term. It is thus distributed through the several years:

In 1835, the excess of cash withdrawn was.....	$6,368 25
In 1836, it was.....	30,788 29
In 1837, it was.....	23,134 88
	<hr/> $60,291 42

A single item, under the name of "cash retained for refunding merchants," appears in the first quarter of 1836. It amounts to $80,769 52. The explanation given of this item by the auditor of the custom-house is, that there were various importers who were entitled to the extension afforded by the act of Congress to those who had suffered by the great fire in the winter of 1835-36, but who had actually paid their bonds. This sum Mr. Swartwout withdrew from the cash fund, in order, as was alleged, to refund to these importers the amount of their bonds so paid, and to give them the benefits of the extension. It never was, however, applied to that purpose, or restored to the debit of cash. It still remains unaccounted for.

It will thus be seen that the sums withdrawn from these five funds, viz: tonnage duties, forfeitures, Treasury warrants, office expenses, and cash to be refunded to merchants, amounted, altogether, to $221,907 36. All these were funds that ought, immediately on their receipt, to have been placed in the Treasury of the United States, or appropriated to the specific purposes for which they came into the collector's hands.

The next fund in which we trace the deficit is much larger in amount than either of the preceding; it consists of cash received by the collector, but which, according to the usage of the custom-house, that officer has been in the habit of retaining in his own hands, under the designation of "protests" and "deposits for unascertained duties," instead of paying it into the Treasury. The former consists of sums supposed to be necessary to pay any amount of damages that may be recovered after suit, by an importer from the collector, on account of his having charged a rate of duty higher than that which is authorized by law, and where, at the time of paying the duty, the importer has filed with the collector a "protest" against the duty charged. The latter consists of sums deposited by the importer at the time of making his entry, in cases where the necessary calculations and examinations to ascertain the exact amount of duty require considerable time; and the deposit remains in the hands of the collector until it is so ascertained, when the proper amount of duty is paid by him into the Treasury, and the balance returned to the importer. It is evident that these funds must, from their nature, constantly leave in the hands of the collector a very large sum, the amount received or retained by him always supplying whatever may be withdrawn to meet the necessary payments, either of protests or ascertained duties.

When Mr. Swartwout's term expired, on the 28th March, 1838, it appears, by his own account, that he was chargeable with $201,096 40 of cash retained to meet "protests," and with $164,010 60 of cash "deposited with him to meet unascertained duties." The only portion of this which he paid over to his successor was $8,229 94 to meet "protests;" leaving the amount of that fund retained by him, $192,866 46. In the deposits to meet "unascertained duties," Mr. Underwood notes a small error of $166 44, making it, in fact, $164,177 04, and thus exhibiting the whole amount of cash retained out of these two funds of "protests" and "deposits," $357,043 50. None of this is now to be found in any bank deposit to the credit of the late collector, nor has any provision been made for it. The whole appears to have been appropriated by him, from time to time, to his private use. We endeavored to ascertain exactly the amounts of cash which had been successively withdrawn, so as to make up the whole of these funds. Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, who kept the check-books, from which only this can be traced, has given us a statement of such of the sums thus drawn out by Mr. Swartwout for his private use as he was able to obtain from the old check-books in the office and his own memorandums. It embraces only the interval between November, 1834, and June, 1837, and amounts in the aggregate to $193,602 20. Of this sum, the cash noted by Mr. Phillips as being withdrawn, was—

In the year 1834.....	$6,261 20
In the year 1835.....	43,700 00
In the year 1836.....	97,841 00
In the year 1837.....	45,800 00

In the earlier period of these transactions, (that is, from 1829 until the close of 1834,) Mr. Phillips was not in the habit of noting the checks thus used by Mr. Swartwout, and he states that from this circumstance, and from the loss of the check-book of 1830 and 1831, (to which we have adverted,) he is unable to trace out the particular items which constitute the residue of the cash thus withdrawn. The statement of Mr. Phillips, giving the amount of each check so drawn, will be found among the documents transmitted to you herewith.

It may be proper here to add a remark in regard to the fund alleged to be retained to meet "protests." No such fund, as we have observed, exists in fact; it has been entirely used and absorbed. But, in addition to this, we were informed by the present collector that such is the situation in which the papers and documents connected with this business have been left, that it is quite impossible for him to present anything like an estimate of the sum that may be required to meet the protests, should any damages be ultimately recovered. On an application from the Treasury Department to the district attorney, made some time since, he gave the same reply, accompanied with the fact that the whole amount of packages of goods on which the duties had been protested, and which then formed the subject of suit, was but six hundred and sixty.

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Defense of the Administration—Mr. Strange.

SENATE.

It is also proper to refer to the payment made by Mr. Ogden, of $30,000, to the Solicitor of the Treasury, as being a deduction to be made from the amount due from Mr. Swartwout. It was not, however, a sum standing in the name of the latter as collector, or forming any portion of either of these funds; it was money in the possession of Mr. Ogden, but admitted by him to have been received from Mr. Swartwout, and which he voluntarily paid over to the United States.

The remaining fund, the deficiency which makes up the whole debt of Mr. Swartwout, is the "bond account." By Mr. Swartwout's returns to the Treasury Department, it appears that when his term of office expired he was chargeable with $3,994,666 59 of bonds for duties not paid into the Treasury. Of these, he transferred to his successor, the present collector, $6,045,386 13, constituting the portion of these bonds not yet due, or unpaid. He also accounted for a further portion, amounting to $2,302,525 63, as having been sent to the district attorney for suit. This leaves the sum of $646,754 83, being the aggregate of the deficit in Mr. Swartwout's bond account. On examination, we ascertained that this aggregate the amounts that became due were as follows: In the year 1837, the sum of.....$611,299 93 And in the first quarter of 1838..... 2,504 28 which is necessary to make up the...$646,754 83 we were unable to ascertain the particulars. It may consist of bonds not accounted for at earlier periods; and though it may ultimately be traced out, this cannot be done without a thorough examination of the bond account, from the commencement of Mr. Swartwout's term.

Making together..... 613,804 21
Of the remaining sum of..... 32,950 62

It will be seen that this deficit in the bond account first occurs in the year 1837. Shortly after its commencement, Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, kept a list for his own satisfaction (as he stated) of a large number of these bonds, which had been paid, and the money received by Mr. Swartwout. It amounts altogether to $597,331 63. When the bond account came to be finally adjusted, in the summer of 1838, by Mr. Fleming, the auditor of the custom-house during the latter part of Mr. Swartwout's term, he received from Mr. Phillips the original list thus made out and kept, and found it to agree, as far as it went, with the deficiency in the bonds which he had ascertained himself, and to which he had called Mr. Swartwout's attention. It fell short, however, of the whole amount of the deficiency in the bond account of the year 1837, and the first quarter of 1838, by $16,472 58; but the particulars of this latter sum Mr. Fleming obtained, so as to make the whole amount of the bond account chargeable to Mr. Swartwout during that period, $613,804 21, as before stated. An explanatory communication of Mr. Fleming, relative to the bond account, together with the list made by Mr. Phillips, will be found among the documents transmitted to you.

It will thus be seen that the deficit of Mr. Swartwout exists in the following different funds:

Tonnage duties.....	$1,783 24
Forfeitures.....	39,833 12
Treasury warrants.....	39,240 05
Office expenses.....	60,291 42
Cash to be refunded to merchants..	80,769 53
Cash to meet "protests".....	192,866 46
Cash deposited to meet unascertained duties.....	164,177 04
Bond account.....	646,754 83
	<hr/> $1,225,705 69

The length and laborious nature of this investigation, added to the steps which have been necessary to secure for the United States, as far as could be done, the property of Mr. Swartwout and his sureties, has left us but little opportunity to offer for your consideration any suggestions as to the best mode of preventing for the future similar defalcations. Such suggestions, too, must mainly depend upon the general plan that it may be deemed expedient to adopt, and will essentially vary, as that may be the formation of a new system for the collection and safe-keeping of the revenue derived from customs, or the mere substitution of certain changes in that which at present exists.

It will, however, be perceived at once, from the facts communicated, that the success which has attended the present defalcation, and its long concealment, may be attributed in a considerable degree to defects incident to the present system. These defects are, mainly, that the same officer (the collector) ascertains the sums due to the Government for duties, reports them himself to the Treasury, collects the money for them, reports the sums collected, and makes and reports all the expenditures charged upon them before they go into the Treasury; that large sums of public money are retained for long periods by the collector, as funds under his exclusive control; and that there are no inspections, regular or occasional, into the books and proceedings of the several custom-houses, now directed by law.

These defects readily suggest the following remedies:

1. That the system for the collection of revenue from customs should resemble that adopted in regard to the revenue from lands; that the officer who ascertains the amount due to the Government, admits vessels to entry, and performs the various functions connected with those parts of a collector's duty, should be distinct from, and independent of, the officer who receives and is accountable for the moneys accruing on those duties. Each making his separate reports, and held to a separate responsibility, would prove a complete check upon the other, and lead to an immediate detection of error, neglect, or defalcation.

2. That all sums of money should be paid into the Treasury; that no officer should be permitted to retain funds, under any pretext, or make payments, except on estimates previously made to the Treasury, or on accounts properly submitted and examined. There would be no difficulty in so arranging this plan as to give quite as much facility as exists at present in the payment of duties, and all other charges now deducted from the accruing revenue, while it would obviate the disadvantages that are inseparable from the present mode.

3. That actual inspections by competent officers from the Treasury Department should be made from time to time, at every principal custom-house. Had such inspections been made at New York, this defalcation could have been easily detected before it had long existed, or reached any very considerable amount.

4. That the use of the public money by any officer intrusted with its collection, safe-keeping, or disbursement, should be made a criminal offense, severely punishable.

We are, very respectfully, yours,

H. D. GILPIN,
J. N. BARKER.

DEFENSE OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

REMARKS OF HON. R. STRANGE,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN SENATE, December 21, 1838,

In reply to Mr. DAVIS's charge of Extravagance against the friends of the Administration.

MR. STRANGE said:

I was very unfortunate, Mr. President, in not being in my seat when the Senator from Massachusetts commenced his remarks in reply to a few words which fell from me the other day; but having heard a part only of those remarks, I must endeavor to make the best replication to them that, under the circumstances, may be in my power. It cannot be expected that I should do justice either to the subject or myself, in thus promptly answering what, it is evident, has been prepared with hours of labor and premeditation; and the only support and source of confidence I possess is, that I have truth and justice on my side.

It is a great advantage in argument for a man to be allowed to state the proposition involved in the controversy according to his own fancy; and very few can resist the temptation of so stating it as, in their estimation, to facilitate very much the task of sustaining their own side of the argument. The Senator from Massachusetts has, on this occasion, availed himself fully of this advantage, and laid down a very different proposition from the one I endeavored to maintain on the occasion to which the Senator has done me the honor to refer. I took the liberty, in an early stage of his address to the Senate, to call his attention to the inaccuracy into which he was falling, but, unfortunately, without avail; and it now becomes necessary for me, in the first place, to correct his statement of the question. He has assumed that the proposition he was called upon to maintain was, that the Opposition was not exclusively responsible for the expenditures of the Government; attributing to me the assertion that they were; and assuming, further, that I made that assertion in the character of an assailant; whereas the truth is, the attitude in which I stood was that of a defendant, denying the truth of the imputation coming from the other side, that the present Administration was chargeable with all the extravagance of public expenditure. My allegation was, that there had been, and still was, a lavish expenditure of the public money, but that the Administration, and the friends of the Administration in this House, could not justly be charged with the guilt of these expenditures; for that appropriations were generally carried by some few friends of the Administration (who, as a body, were in favor of low taxation and moderate expenditure) joining themselves to the mass of the Opposition, (who were, on the contrary, as a body, in favor of high taxation and lavish expenditure.) I protested against the Opposition charging the Administration with extravagance, while almost every expenditure was voted for by the mass of their own body, opposed by the friends of the Administration as a class, and carried by a few of them in almost every instance, who, under some peculiarity of opinion in relation to the particular subject, the wishes or supposed interests of their constituents, or some other consideration, supported the appropriation with the mass of the Opposition, and thus effected its passage. I read some passages from the Journal of the Senate of the last session, in proof of my position, and left it to the country to decide whether my conclusion was just or erroneous. I did nothing more. But one who has heard the long series of remarks made by the Senator in reply, and his frequent allusions to what I said, might justly suppose that I had delivered to the Senate a long harangue; whereas I can safely appeal to those who heard me, whether I detained the Senate beyond a few moments.

I am not ignorant that there is some little difficulty in assigning to gentlemen in this body their proper places in the political ranks. Some, it is true, are obviously and confessedly the friends of the Administration, and others as palpably its opponents; but there are others whose position is not so well defined. The other day I felt so strongly the delicacy of saying of some gentlemen whether they were the friends of the Administration or its opponents, that I forbore the undertaking. If I said they were opponents of the Administration, I was fearful of giving offense by what would probably be considered as denunciation; and if I should say they were friends of the Administration, I was equally fearful of firing their independent souls with indignation at the supposed injustice of ranking them among "the vassals of the President." There are gentlemen in this body claiming, I believe, to constitute "an armed neutrality." Of what number it consists, is a question of very delicate decision, and when that decision is made, it is still more difficult to define their position. Judging by their conduct, however, they ought not to complain if they are ranked with the Opposition, for although a party may assume a neutral flag, if it is found continually pouring a hot fire into the ranks of one belligerent, and never leveling a hostile gun in the direction of the other, it would not be thought unreasonable in those thus constantly assailed to look upon it as having taken side with the enemy. In the present matter, however, I believe it will make but little difference in the calculation on which side the "armed neutrality" may chance to be counted.

Defense of the Administration—Mr. Strange.

SENATE.

My object, Mr. President, in calling the attention of the Senate to the votes on appropriations, is to bring the gentlemen in the Opposition from vague and general denunciation to specific and intelligible charges. I wish them to toe the mark. I am not ignorant of the prejudice produced through the country by this charge of extravagance upon the Administration. It is done to a great extent in my own State. I wish it thoroughly sifted. If it is just, let its justice be established, and all rightful consequences follow its establishment; but if it is unjust, (as I verily believe,) let not innocence be borne down with the burden of guilt.

It amazes me that the Democratic party has been able to sustain itself with all the disadvantages under which it labors. That it has so far done it, is a cogent argument in favor of the honesty and intelligence of the people. We are constantly slain with our own weapons, and our own principles are used by our adversaries for our overthrow. Nearly all the newspapers throughout the country are in the hands of the Opposition, through which falsehoods are circulated, and seen by many whom their contradictions or exposure never reach. The leading principles of Democracy are dear to the mass of our people who understand them, and they cannot be drawn away from their support by fair means. The art which has been most successful, is the production of a confusion of tongues—an obscuration of the marks by which the advocates of those principles may be known from those who oppose them; fastening the imputation of wanting those principles upon those who are most zealously struggling for their maintenance. Thus the people are assured that an Administration which has gone furthest in the rescue of Democratic principles, from being overthrown and trampled under foot, is wanting in economy and extravagant in its expenditures. All know that economy is a cardinal feature in the Democratic faith, and the Administration which wants it, is wanting in its own principles if it professes to be Democratic. When, then, the charge of extravagance is made and believed, it shakes the confidence of him who hears and believes it in the Democracy of that Administration. The consequence is, an ardent, uncalculating man, who hears and believes the charge, is apt, in all the disgust and indignation of one who conceives himself deceived or betrayed, to denounce the Administration, and withdraw from it his support, without stopping to inquire into the motives of those who profess to point out the supposed abuses, and whether a change of Administration is likely to produce a reform. It is by a process such as this that Opposition recruits are constantly supplied.

Upon the same principle a recent artifice is being played off. It has been for some time settled in the minds of the Democracy of the country that the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States had been actively engaged in the warfare upon free principles. The Administration has been for years engaged in so denouncing it. During all that time, the Opposition has been at work to countervail these denunciations by representing them as altogether false and groundless. But, in spite of their efforts, a large majority of the people of the United States have received these denunciations as speaking forth the words of truth and soberness, and a current is now setting against the Bank which can no longer be stemmed. That institution having failed, through its hostility, to overthrow the Administration, an attempt is now made to render its supposed attachment more effectual. A rumor has been running through the country for some months past that an alliance had been formed between the Government and the Bank. In this state of things, Mr. Biddle, the president of that institution, comes out with a letter, and much astonishment is felt and expressed at the dissimilarity of its tone from that of those which have preceded it from the same source, and many wonder for what purpose it was written. To this latter question there seems to me to be but one response—it is a part of the system—it was to give color and confirmation to the rumor of the alliance. The president of the bank could not come out and say that such an alliance had been formed, but he could write such a letter as would leave those who chose to draw inferences to do so without blushing. Ostensibly his letter is merely for the purpose of announcing his abdication of the autocracy of this Republic, but the important matter is the inference to be drawn from that abdication, and to give support to that inference was the letter written. As an abdication it must forcibly remind one, who has read Goldsmith's play of the Good-natured Man, of Lord Lofty's renunciation of the control of affairs of State. Having pretended that he had vast influence at court, and could dispose of place and preferment at his pleasure, he was at last detected, and all his pretensions found to be utterly groundless—when he philosophically exclaims: "I am resolved upon a reformation. So now if any one has a mind for preferment, he may take my place. I'm determined to resign."

The Bank of the United States has hitherto claimed to have the currency of the country under its control, and that nothing but its power and skill could countervail the mischievous measures of the Government; but finding that this delusion was fast passing away, and that events were hastening on the disclosure, that the movements of the Government had been in fact stripping it of its ill-gotten power, to the great promotion of the general welfare, that bank makes a merit of necessity, and professes the resignation of a power it never in truth possessed. Listen to the tone in which its president speaks:

"Of the future it is difficult to speak; but in that future the Bank of the United States will no longer occupy its past position. The Bank of the United States had ceased to be a national institution in 1836, and was preparing to occupy its new place as a State bank, when the troubles of 1837 forced it in some degree back into its old position; and it then devoted all its power to assist in carrying the country unhurt through its recent troubles. Having done this, its extraordinary duties ceased. For the future it abdicates this involuntary power. It has no longer any responsibility to the Union; it has no longer any controversies with the Government of the Union. It now desires only repose, and it will take its rank hereafter, as a simple State institution, devoted exclusively to its own special concerns."

"I rejoice, too, that this new position of the bank absolves me from many cares and duties. In the general confusion of public affairs, during the last two years, it has been my lot to be more prominent than my own inclination prompted, and often to assume a station which would have better fitted others. But public calamities justify the apparent forwardness they require, as great dangers are best met by defying them. My task is now ended, and I gladly withdraw from these responsibilities, carrying with me the only satisfaction I ever sought in them—the consciousness of having done my duty to the country as a good citizen."

But in its expiring throes, as the antagonist of the Government, the bank yet seeks to wound, and by giving color to a report that a reconciliation had taken place between them, cause many to withdraw from the support of an Administration which had given the hand of fellowship, as might be supposed, to one of the deadliest enemies of Democracy. See in what terms of innuendo its president expresses himself:

"During these movements it became important to understand distinctly the course of the Government. In my letter to you of the 5th of April last, I stated my conviction that there could be no safe or permanent resumption of specie payments by the banks until the policy of the Government towards them was changed." This change was soon and happily made. On the 30th of May the specie circulars, requiring payments in coin in the land offices, was repealed by Congress. On the 25th of June, the bill called the Sub-Treasury, requiring coin in all payments to the Government, was negatived. In the month of July, the Government agreed to receive an anticipated payment of the bonds of 'the bank to the amount of between four or five millions of dollars, in a credit to the Treasurer on the books of the bank, and arrangements were made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank. These arrangements, as honorable to the executive officers as they were beneficial to the public service, brought the Government into efficient coöperation for the reëstablishment of the currency, and opened the way to a resumption of specie payments. That resumption accordingly took place throughout the middle States on the 13th of August, and in many of the southern and western States soon after."

But to return to the subject of extravagance, which has been, as I have said, similarly used, and for similar purposes. The Senator from Massachusetts charges me with reading the Senate a homily on economy, and speaks of my censuring the Senate for its votes. Now, this all rests entirely in the imagination of the Senator. I read no homilies to the Senate, neither did I undertake to censure any Senator for his vote. I only complained, as I still do, against gentlemen voting for measures themselves, and then censuring others for the extravagance of them. It was to show the injustice of this complaint, coming from gentlemen in the Opposition, and that expenditures were made principally by their votes, that I read the record, which he has taken up and endeavored to explain, so as to do away the force of my inferences. He takes up, in the first place, the record at page 328 of the Senate Journal, and inquires what there is to complain of here? Again: I say I made no complaint against gentlemen for their votes. I only said that this was a bill for the appropriation of money for laying out a road in the Wisconsin Territory; and, judging by past experience, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] moved to amend it by inserting, "Provided always, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to imply that the United States are pledged, or in any manner bound, to make any appropriations in future to make or construct said roads, or any part or portion of them," lest it might be used as a plea for further appropriations; that Government, having commenced the work, was bound to go on, and thus entail upon us endless expenditures. It was to see who was willing to stop this leak from the public Treasury, and who for keeping it open that this record was produced. The Senator from Massachusetts, in recalling our attention to it and, to show that my inference is unwarranted, selects for reading only a few of the names of those who voted. This, I insist, is not the fair way of proceeding. The Senator well knows that his speech will be read by many who will never look into the Journal to see what, upon the whole, is the complexion of the votes on each side. He singles out a few conspicuous individuals on the Administration side, who voted against the amendment, and from thence would have it inferred that my proposition is disproved. But my proposition was not that none of the friends of the Administration voted against economical measures, but, on the contrary, that a few were always found with the mass of the Opposition, from local or other considerations, voting against them; and thus these measures failed, and the contrary ones prevailed. In fairness, the whole record should be submitted, by which, as I insist, my proposition would be fully sustained. The vote really stood thus:

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Allen, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Grundy, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Swift, Trotter, Walker, White, and Williams."

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Prentiss, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Webster, and Young."

On the motion to postpone the special order of the day for the purpose of considering the bill (S. 86) for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, it is recorded in Senate Journal, p. 244:

"The yeas were: Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, and Young.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright."

So that although the votes in favor of taking up the bill, and thereby indicating a friendly feeling towards it, were mixed, yet of those opposed to it, twenty-one in number, there was but a single Opposition vote.

Again, on motion by Mr. NORVELL, to lay this bill on the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19.

"The yeas were: Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Rives, Roane, Walker, Wall, and Williams.

"The nays were: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Grundy, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, White, and Young."

In page 414 of the Journal will be found the passage of the Cumberland road bill, which was passed by the following vote.

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster, Wright, and Young.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, and Williams."

Only three Opposition men voting in the negative: and again, upon its being returned from the House with an amendment, it is found as follows on page 417 of the Senate Journal:

"On the question 'Shall this bill pass with an amendment?' it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 18.

"On motion of Mr. Lumpkin, the yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present,

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright, and Young.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Trotter, and Williams."

The next vote to which I adverted, was the bill explanatory of the act regulating the pay and emoluments of the brevet officers.

On the question "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 18.

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Trotter, and Wall.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Brown, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, White, Williams, Wright, and Young."

How many of the Opposition voted against this bill?—a bill proposing to increase the compensation of a class of officers without any corresponding benefit to the public.

In the Senate Journal, page 466, it is found thus recorded:

"The bill (S. 241) to encourage the introduction, and promote the cultivation of, tropical plants in the United States, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, was read a third time.

"On the question, 'Shall this bill pass?'

"It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 11.

"On motion by Mr. Tipton,

"The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present,

"Those who voted in the affirmative are: Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Trotter, Wall, Webster, and Young.

"Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Allen, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Strange, Tipton, White, and Williams."

A small minority, only one of whom is an Opposition man.

On the bill to purchase the right to use Dr. Boyd Reilly's vapor bath,

"On the question, 'Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?'

"It was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 20.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are: Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Robinson, Sevier, and Swift.

"Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young."

How many of the Opposition were found voting against this expenditure?

In page 519 will be found that, the bill making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, buoys, and for making surveys, being under consideration, the question on taking up the bill was decided—yeas 23, nays 14:

"The yeas were: Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Wall, Williams, and Wright.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Fulton, Lumpkin, Merrick, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, White, and Young."

How many of the Opposition were found voting against this measure? At a very late period of the last night of the session, I rose for the purpose of stopping this bill, but it being found that a quorum was not present, I was prevailed upon not to persist in calling for the yeas and nays, as it would have put a stop to all the other business of the Senate.

The Senator asks why I am so much opposed to light-houses and harbors, to those important assistants to commerce? I have never expressed hostility to either the one or the other. I admit that commerce has been a great benefactress to mankind. I did denounce the system or principle of the light-house and harbor bills, which, in my opinion, has done much to corrupt the legislation of this country. They are carried through upon the log-rolling principle, a principle, in my estimation, so corrupting in its tendency, that with all the inconveniences that might attend it, I would willingly see the Constitution so amended as to prohibit the introduction of more than one subject into the same bill, even by way of amendment. But I have no objection to light-houses when necessary and proper, and with those limitations, would not even oppose their being located "in the skies." To light, in every form, and from every source, I am friendly. I am not one of those who prefer darkness to light, (I will not say "because their deeds are evil," but because it does not suit their purposes to have things seen as they really are,) but am thoroughly opposed to that huggemugger mode of proceeding by which truth is stifled or hid, and advantages unjustly obtained.

I next called the attention of the Senate to the appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities, and reminded the Senate what frequent and loud complaints were then made of extravagance, and how often the expenses of the Seminole war were calculated and spoken of, and yet, when it came to the vote, upon a call for the yeas and nays, not a Senator on either side could bring himself to vote against the bill. In proceeding with the record, I came to the harbor bill, and referred to page 538 of the Senate Journal:

"On motion of Mr. Davis, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions in, and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, during the year 1838, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 11.

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, Lyon, Merrick, Niles, Norvell, Robbins, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, and Wright.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Trotter, Wall, and White."

How many of the Opposition voted against taking up this bill, which involved such heavy expenditures?

"On a motion made indefinitely to postpone this bill, those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, and White.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Merrick, Norvell, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young."

On a motion to amend by inserting an additional appropriation of $48,000,

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Lyon, Merrick, Norvell, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, and Wright.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Strange, Trotter, Williams, White, and Young."

On a motion to amend by striking out an appropriation of $20,000,

"The votes were, in the affirmative: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Strange, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, and Wright.

"Those in the negative were: Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Merrick, Preston, Robbins, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tipton, Webster, and Young."

On the Indian appropriation bill, to which Mr. WHITE offered an amendment appropriating $150,000 for subsistence and expenses of such Indians west of the Mississippi, who, by reason of the recent emigration, &c., were unable to subsist themselves,

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Allen, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Hubbard, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, and Williams."

How many of the Opposition were found voting against this bill? I have no doubt of the fact, that I could go through the whole Journal, and produce similar results. In truth, almost any proposition meets the views of some few friends of the Administration, supported by the mass of the Opposition. But let the facts go before the country; I wish to produce no false impression.

But the Senator from Massachusetts says that all these appropriations amount to between only two and three millions of dollars, and asks why I have not thought proper to go into the extravagances of other years. The Senator has been distinctly informed that it was only in the suddenness of reply to a challenge made by himself that I spoke at all, and was obliged to take only such facts as I could readily lay my hand upon. The Journals of the last session furnished the most ready source of supply, and to that I accordingly resorted. But to oblige the Senator, I will take one instance from the Journal of a former session, in which $5,000,000 are proposed to be voted away at a single dash, in payment of what are called French spoils anterior to 1800.

By turning to the Senate Journal for the second session of the Twenty-Third Congress, page 125, upon the question, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it will be seen that the vote was as follows:

"In the affirmative: Messrs. Bell, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, McKean, Moore, Nau-dain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Shepley, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Waggaman, and Webster"—only two friends of the Administration.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Morris, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tyler, White, and Wright"—not more than four or five Opposition Senators.

But the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. Preston,] in reply to my colleague the other day, remarked, in justification of his course upon this measure, that there was a vast difference between voting new expenditures and appropriations for the payment of the existing debts of the Government. I admit the correctness of the distinction, but deny its application to the present case. I do not see how this claim for indemnity can be placed upon the footing of a debt. And again: party spirit must rage to an extent even greater than it does at present, when it shall be settled that the votes above referred to were dictated solely by a differing sense of justice. Does any gentleman believe that, however we may differ in politics, a higher sense of justice prevails on one side of this Chamber than the other? No man can believe it. When, then, nearly all of one side are found voting for a proposition, and the other against it, some other mode of accounting for it must be found than the comparative sense of justice of the two parties. I insist it arises from the different sense entertained by the two parties of the nature and character of this Government, and its obligations in relation to revenue: one considering the trust special and for very limited purposes; the other giving it an almost limitless range.

But I will show, for the satisfaction of the Senator, another fact or two. In the session of 1833-34, when there was a decided Opposition majority in this body, and when the amount called for by the estimates of the Treasury Department, was.....$18,057,488 73 The amount appropriated was.... 20,968,992 49 Exceeding the amount called for by..... 2,911,503 76 Besides this, further appropriations amounting to $5,607,488 passed this body, which did not pass the other, including the famous $5,000,000 for French spoils. Again: The annual estimates for 1835 were $15,610,232 73 The annual appropriations for 1835 were..... 18,347,014 36 The latter exceeding the former... 2,736,781 63 In the same session, to wit: the 21 session of the Twenty-Third Congress, appropriations passed an Opposition Senate, which did not become a law for want of the concurrence of the other branches of the Government, amounting to..... 6,031,400 00 So that it appears, in the Twenty-Third Congress, when there was a decided Opposition majority in this body, appropriations passed it amounting to—

1st session, actual appropriations	$20,968,992 49
"    projected    "	5,607,488 00
2d session, actual appropriations	18,347,014 36
"    projected    "	6,031,400 00

Total.....$50,954,894 85

While the estimates for the same period were—

1st session.....	$18,057,488 73
2d session.....	15,610,232 73
	33,667,721 46

Exceeding the estimates by the small sum of.....$17,287,173 39

But the Opposition are, whatever may be said of the particular votes on questions of expenditure, mainly responsible for the extravagance of the Government, in that, through their instrumentality the revenue has been raised to an inordinate height. The same principles which control men as individuals, control them as masses. Give a man money, and he will be profuse. Some men, it is true, are misers. But the instances are rare. The miser is a monster, and would not be so if he were common. But in the general, the unlimited command of money will render a man extravagant, and very frequently profligate. Those, then, who inordinately enrich the Government by high tariffs, &c., are the true authors of extravagance and corruption. When the fiscal channels are filled to bursting, the fluid will find vent, and pour itself forth in all directions, corrupting individuals and stimulating the Government to extravagance in all its forms. Those, therefore, who refuse to bring down the revenue to the economical wants of the Government, are, and ought to be, alone responsible for its extravagance; and upon this ground, if no other, it is extremely unfair for the Opposition to charge the Administration with excessive expenditures.

But it is useless to spend more time in the production of facts in support of what must necessarily be true from established principles. The principles of the Democratic party are in favor of an economical administration of the affairs of this Government; and when a Democratic administration falls into extravagance, it is the effect of human weakness, that unfortunate principle of our nature by which good men are often forced to do by temptation what their consciences condemn; and, like them, a Democratic administration is always striving to make head against temptation, and get back again to the path of rectitude. Not so with the Opposition: a strong, energetic, and splendid central Government is, with them, the first desideratum; and to render it so, the expenditures must necessarily be vast. High tariffs are laid for the protection of manufactures, and to carry out the great principles of the American system. By this, large revenues are raised, which must, in their turn, be expended within the States, producing consequences upon which it were tedious at present to enter.

Sir, I admit our expenditures should be reduced; but, disguise it as they will, it is not the extravagance, but the parsimony of this Administration which raises up most of its adversaries against it. It is the well-grounded belief that another administration will scatter, with more profuse hands, those crumbs which so many mouths are eagerly gaping to receive, while their throats are roaring forth extravagance and corruption. The office-holders under this Administration, of which I have often had occasion to remark that a large majority of them are hostile to it, are mainly so from the expectation that more liberal provisions will be made for them, and the rein of control over their extravagancies and corruptions held with a slacker hand, should the Opposition get into power.

But the Senator uses the specious argument that we of course must be alone responsible for the expenditures of the Government, because we are the majority, and pass or refuse to pass just what we please; that the Opposition are a mere handful, and can do nothing but what we choose to allow them. Sir, is this a fair representation of the case? Is this the way the gentlemen talk upon the eve of an election. Do they not then cry out that theirs is, in truth, the strong party? that they have, and will have, majorities everywhere, and let him who wishes to be on the strong side join them? But whenever measures are to be investigated in which they have been the main actors, with a view to censure, why then they dwindle into a mere handful. Poor innocent creatures! What could such a miserably reduced party do, if they were ever so much disposed? Let the public mind be no longer abused by a misconception of facts. The Administration party is not that drilled and united phalanx which many suppose. On the contrary, it is, as I have said, prone to divide on almost every question. Neither is it true that the Opposition is powerless; but, joined as it frequently is by the "armed neutrality," is able to control, as it often does, the action of the Government. In both ends of the Capitol, measures fail which the mass of the friends of the Administration wish to prevail, and e converso. Why, if the Administration party is so united, and the Opposition so weak, has not the Independent Treasury bill long since become a law?

The Senator from Massachusetts, somewhat tired of the journal record, turns to the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and proceeds to complain of him, also, for reading homilies, as the Senator chooses to style them, on economy, as if it had not been the practice of the Secretary of the Treasury, from the foundation of the Government, to offer to Congress through the President his views in relation to the finances of the country. Mr. Hamilton set the example in an eminent degree, and has been followed to a greater or less extent by all his successors. The Senator then calls our attention with solemn earnestness to the fact, that the expenditures of the Government for the year 1838 are $40,427,218 68, and comments on it as a very important discovery. Now for what purpose is this done? The Senator knows very well that to the plain men of this country, forty millions is a startling sum, and that it is difficult for them to imagine any fair mode by which such a sum can be disposed of; and that in their amazement at the sum they will very probably conclude that a large portion of such an expenditure was unauthorized, and of course be seized with horror at the Administration who made it. But the Senator from Massachusetts knew how all this was, of what items the expenditures consisted, and under what authority it was made. Why, then, did he not, in all fairness, come out and tell us that all these expenditures were under appropriations by Congress, and that the appropriations thus made by Congress exceeded by nearly twenty millions the sum asked for by the departments of the Government? Why did he not inform us that upwards of eight millions of this forty were in payment of the public debt, including the redemption of Treasury notes; that your Indian treaties and Indian wars have absorbed about ten millions more; and that your pension list, which benefits mainly the northern end of this continent, took upwards of two millions more.

The Senator asks why, in my zeal for retrenchment, I did not turn to the expenses of our foreign relations. I answer, simply because I do not know of any unnecessary expenditures in that department. It may be, and I think it highly probable there are, and if so, I would gladly see them corrected. But I should think our foreign relations a most unfavorable ground for the gentleman and his party, and am rather surprised at his invitation to meet him there. Has he forgotten the constructive journeys and the unauthorized missions under some by-gone Administrations? And does he not remember that, not long ago, a man whom the people of this nation have since thought fit to dignify with the highest honor, was recalled from a foreign mission, and the country necessarily subjected to the expense of sending another in his place? And has he forgotten by whose votes this was done? If any similar faults are chargeable to this Administration, the Senator is doubtless prepared to point them out.

He next turns his attention to the collection of the revenue, and wonders that I have not made the expenses incident to that a subject of comment. Upon that, I must say I had not time to make the investigation, and I presume it is not expected that any member of this body should be able to enter impromptu upon that complex subject. If there are any competent, I certainly am not one; but I may safely venture to say that most of those expenditures are made in the Senator's own region of country. He well knows they are regulated by law; and I doubt not, like most of the other expenditures, are made mainly by the votes of gentlemen of his own political complexion. But he states it as a fact, and then professes some difficulty in its explanation, that while, during a part of General Jackson's administration, the revenue was declining, the expense of collection rather increased. The Senator I think has himself supplied us with an answer by informing us that in many places the revenue had so fallen off as not to cover the expenses of collection; while, therefore, the aggregate revenue fell off, and became more concentrated at particular points, where the expenses were consequently increased, the expenses at the other places could not be materially diminished.

The Senator next comes round to the Post Office Department, and without specifying any particular extravagance, inquires why I have not directed my attention to that? I believe the present head of that Department is anxious to subject it to the most rigid economy, and only regret that he has not been allowed to administer its affairs more according to his truly Democratic notions. With respect to the box money, I think it, with the Senator from Massachusetts, an abuse. I believe it a mere Yankee trick, by which the northern postmasters first contrived to swell the profits of their office, from whom those further South have unfortunately caught it.

But the Senator says I have forgotten other small matters, and first alludes to the branch mints. Whether the mints are conducted upon the most economical principles, I am not prepared to say; perhaps there may be some extravagance in their administration, yet I am not aware that there is. But if the Senator means to say that those institutions are either useless or improper, I am directly at issue with him. Perhaps it is not to be wondered at that an advocate for the paper system should have some aversion to coining even the gold of his own land, and that he who holds the coinage power of Congress to extend its jurisdiction to the regulation by law of the paper money of the States, should see no necessity for exercising the direct power of coinage. Neither is it strange that those whose iron soil drives them to exercise their wits in transmuting baser substances to gold, and inviting it from foreign parts, should feel some envy of those to whom God has given that precious metal as the spontaneous product of their soil, or yielded it to them, by the simplest labor, from the bowels of the harmless earth. Yes, sir, Providence has made the region which I in part represent, rich in its mineral resources; and I hold it but right that when the Constitution has conferred upon this Government solely the power of making and regulating coin, that she should extend her hand to us, who furnish her the materials to relieve them; and that she should not require us to traverse half the continent to find a market for that of which she claims the monopoly.

The obligation to coin is one of the most imperative in the Constitution, and every principle of justice and propriety conjoin in approving the location of the mints where the bullion can be furnished. Few indeed are the crumbs which fall to our share from the public table, and those few ought not to excite the envy or displeasure of our brethren who partake so largely of its dainties.

He next alludes to the Army as an item of extravagance. An army is proverbially an expensive thing. It is difficult for any Government to administer its affairs economically; and least of all a republic. So many agents must necessarily expose to a great deal of waste, and it is impossible that the supervision which a monarchy would afford can be placed over them. An army must needs be expensive. But does the Senator propose that we should go without one? Is everything to be done for commerce and nothing for safety and honor? Is the American people indeed so sordid of souls to look only to commercial profit, and make no provision for the protection of their homes or the honor of their flag? No man can be more opposed than I am to a large standing army, but so far from believing the present one excessive in magnitude, it is, in my estimation, inadequate to the present necessities of the country—to the protection of our vast extent of frontier, along which so many causes are in agitation, threatening us with war.

In conclusion, the Senator from Massachusetts demands of me whether I hold the Opposition responsible for having carried on the Seminole war. No, sir; no. Far be it from me to tear the laurel from the proper brow and bestow it where it is so little coveted. I hold the Seminole Indians alone responsible in any odious sense for the origin and continuance of that war. On their part it is one of aggression, on ours merely defensive; and for the maintenance of that defensive war, with all the disadvantages under which it is waged, I appropriate the credit to no party or section of the country. I am surprised to hear the intimation from the Senator that the prosecution of that war is of doubtful propriety. Sir, it should be the first maxim of every gallant nation not to let a hostile footstep rest upon her soil. Like the ancient Romans, never to think of making terms with a foe until he relinquishes the attitude of an invader. For one, I would sooner ingulf the whole Treasury of the nation than suffer the foot of an invader, civil or savage, to rest upon our sacred soil. The Seminole Indians may possibly suppose they are engaged in the vindication of a just cause. Be it so. But does the Senator from Massachusetts believe the territory in contest theirs or ours? If the former, then he is right in condemning the war; but if, as I entertain no doubt it is, the property of these United States, it should be defended with our last cent of treasure and our last drop of blood. Perhaps there are reasons for some difference of feeling upon this subject between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself. The scene of the Seminole war is in the southern end of this continent, and not in the northern; it is nearer to my home and my fireside than to his; and the sufferers by savage violence are more nearly my neighbors. The appeal, therefore, is more direct to my sympathies and my patriotism. Again, in process of time this disputed land is destined to give a wider spread to the institution peculiarly southern—an institution against which all the feelings and prejudices of the Senator are arrayed. My prejudices and feelings are all the other way; nay, my judgment, too, for I most confidently believe that this institution is favorable to the highest moral development of the freemen who live within its influence; that it promotes the growth of all the nobler and generous qualities of our nature in every bosom, except, perhaps, that of the slave himself. But, with all these allowances, I am certain the Senator from Massachusetts does injustice to himself in intimating that he would be willing to relinquish that war, with anything short of the conquest of the country; he is not, I am persuaded, that craven wretch who would tamely surrender any portion of the sacred soil of freedom to any foe, whether savage or civil.

In conclusion, Mr. President—that the expenses of this Government ought to be diminished, and its revenues kept low, I most confidently believe. Such is the opinion of the head of this Administration, as he had assured us in his annual message at this very session; and such is the judgment of the bulk of his friends; and if the Opposition gentlemen will join us in sincere efforts to limit expenditure, instead of making it a subject of electioneering declamation, the evil will very soon be greatly diminished. That any administration can make the machinery of Government move in perfection—that there shall be no errors of judgment—no infidelity of agents, it would be madness to expect. All that I ask for the present Administration is, that its acts shall be judged with candor, and proper allowances made for human imperfection and the difficulties by which it has been envired; and, above all, that the faults of its opponents shall not rest upon its shoulders; and I confidently assert it will prove an Administration well entitled to the respect and confidence of the American people.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS MORRIS, OF OHIO,

IN SENATE, December 31, 1838,

On his motion to rescind the order to print thirty thousand copies of certain documents relative to the duties on Salt.

In the Senate of the United States, Friday, 28th December, Mr. BENTON made the following motion, which was agreed to without a division—that thirty thousand copies of the following papers be printed for the use of the Senate:

1st. Copies of written evidence, as required by an order of the British House of Commons, dated 24th June, 1817, which was laid before the Board of Trade, the right honorable Nicholas Vansittart being president, in an inquiry recently made at the instance of Lord Kenyan and Sir Thomas Bernard, as to the supposed operation of the salt duty, and restrictions on the fisheries, agriculture, and laboring classes of the Kingdom of Great Britain. Ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, 4th of July, 1817, (35 folio pages.)

2d. The report of the select committee of the British House of Commons, appointed in the year 1818, to take into consideration the laws relating to the salt duties, and the means of remedying the inconveniences arising therefrom, and to report thereon, with their observations and opinions, to the House, together with the minutes of evidence taken before them. Ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, June 1st, 1818, (8 folio pages.)

3d. Minutes of evidence taken before the same committee from the 18th of March, 1818, to the 7th of May of the same year; presented to the House of Commons with the report, June 1st, 1818, and ordered by the House to be printed, (204 folio pages.)

On the Monday following Mr. MORRIS submitted to the Senate a resolution rescinding the order of Friday, for the printing of the above named documents.

In support of his resolution Mr. M. said: That not being in his seat at the time the order was made, he had, on submitting his resolution, the first opportunity which presented, made a few remarks in support of his motion; but at the suggestion of a Senator, that the mover of the original resolution was not then in his seat, he agreed that his resolution should lie on the table until that honorable Senator [Mr. BENTON] should be present. He now felt it his duty, with the indulgence of the Senate, to state the whole of his reasons, that the Senator from Missouri might fully understand his objections.

His first objection was the printing of foreign documents by the order of this body. He thought the printing of papers connected with the policy of our own country, and essentially necessary for the legislation of Congress, could alone justify the expenditure of public money for such purposes, and Congress had adopted the practice of printing an extra number of such documents for distribution, until such practice had grown a serious evil, and proved one of the many extravagant uses of the public money; but we are now about to enlarge this job work by printing a book of foreign matter, the proceedings of the board of trade in England, the report of a select committee of the British House of Commons, and the minutes of evidence on which that report was founded, making a folio volume of two hundred and forty-seven pages as printed in London. He thought the printing of books by the order of Congress a very unjustifiable use of the public money, and if Congress took but a few steps more in this business—indeed if they persisted in the order for printing thirty thousand copies of this book—it might well be said that instead of a legislative body, Congress would soon convert themselves into a great national book concern. He had no objections to concerns of this kind, but he considered them as properly belonging to individuals, and not to the Government. A Methodist book concern, a Presbyterian book concern, or that of any other religious or political association, he thought a commendable thing; but it was a private affair by which individuals at their own expense undertook to promulgate through the country and amongst the people, their own peculiar tenets, opinions, and doctrines; and all they asked of the Government in the exercise of this, their undoubted right, was protection and safety for their persons and property, from mobs and unlawful violence.

But he had seen with regret and alarm, Congress, as a public body, ordering the printing of documents and papers calculated to promote the particular political views and doctrines of individuals or parties in Congress. It was true he had gone with the practice and the tide in this matter, when the documents to be printed were those emanating from some part of the Government, or from a committee of Congress, and were designed as the foundation of legislative action. But he thought even a practice of that kind was better followed in its breach than its observance; but when we are called upon to print a foreign document, he thought it time to pause and reflect on the nature and extent of this business. Not being in his seat at the time it was moved, in the newspaper in which he first heard of this order the mover was made to say that "large as the number was he proposed to have printed, he thought he might venture to say in advance that every Senator would have applications for more copies than would fall to his share." This might be true; but if those who would apply for the book really thought it useful and valuable, they would purchase it if in their power, at the price of a dollar or two; and if this was the case, private interest, which was always on the look out, and was eagle-eyed, would at once induce some bookseller to publish an edition of this work, though a far less number than thirty thousand should be demanded. The fact was, and he well knew it, those public documents printed by order were seldom read; and he would venture to say on the present occasion, that if the thirty thousand of these salt documents should be printed, not one third of the members of Congress themselves would ever read one, and they would be read by a far less proportion of the community at large.

There was another view of this subject which struck his mind as very objectionable to the printing of this document, as well as many others which had been ordered by both Houses of Congress. These orders are always made with the professed view of circulating information among the people. And how was this done? We tax the people at large, say $200,000, though he believed the books and printing ordered by the two Houses at the last session of Congress would amount to a much larger sum; yet these documents and books, when printed, became, ipso facto, the private property of the members. A fair division of the plunder, he admitted, was always made. The members could either sell them or send them to their friends, as each one thought best, or leave them in their boarding-rooms in this city, to be used for all possible purposes. That these documents were frequently ordered to be printed with an eye to political effect, he had no doubt; he meant for the purpose of advancing the private political views of individuals; and he did not believe, for himself, that the people would sustain any gentleman who would not only tell them the truth, but the whole truth, on this subject. Let any gentleman, in his view, collect together one hundred thousand of his constituents, and inform them that he would lay and collect a tax, to which each should contribute fifty cents, and that with this sum of $50,000 he would cause to be printed thirty thousand documents—yes, even these British documents—and that he would select thirty thousand from among the number, to whom, should it suit his pleasure, he would bestow as a gratuity, and under his own frank, too, one copy each, to become the private property of such individual. He did not believe that any portion of the American people would consent to be taxed in this manner and for such a purpose as this; yet such were the facts of the case, and such the results of voting books and documents to ourselves. We tax the whole people, and then put our hands into the public Treasury; apply the tax to the purchase of books to distribute among our friends, which may enable them to sustain us in all future elections, by furnishing arguments, or at least inducements for them to do so. But it seems as if we had exhausted the strength of our own policy, and are compelled to draw upon foreign sources, as a foundation for the legislation of the country. It may all be right enough in this case, and at this time, but the example, he feared, might lead to very improper results. Suppose a majority should happen in Congress, or even in this branch, who desired to introduce into the country a foreign system, or the practice of foreign Governments, hereditary succession, or titles of nobility; and to enlighten the people as to the great benefits which imagination might suppose would result from such measures, they might order the printing for distribution, from the example we have set, any number of documents favorable to such a scheme, to prepare the people to submit to a bill which was afterwards to be brought in for such purpose. He would much rather let the $50,000 which he apprehended this printing would cost, remain in the pockets of the people, to purchase such books as their judgment or their fancy should suggest. He did not believe this Government ought to expend money for any such purpose.

There is (said Mr. M.) another and still more pressing objection to this order for printing, because it comes home directly to the Treasury itself, and to the means we have for the discharge of existing just demands against the Government. The extravagances of the Government had become a by-word and a song, and the corruptions which such a system was introducing through the country was alarming. The astounding defalcations which had lately taken place amongst collecting and disbursing agents, which met us at every turn, was, he considered, a part and parcel of this system of extravagant and improper appropriations; and in these piping times of talking about economy and reform, he considered that our declarations were but in mockery of our doings. What, sir, was the amount of the contingent expenses of the other House of Congress for the last session?—$272,245 84! Yes, sir, only two hundred and seventy-two thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars and eighty-four cents! You see, sir, how exact and economical we are; we go down to the matter of cents. The contingent expenses of the Senate, for the same session, was $112,992 20. One hundred and twelve thousand nine hundred and ninety-two dollars and twenty cents! A man of common sense and prudent habits, in looking over the items to make up this enormous amount of expenditure for the mere contingencies of Congress, for one session, must feel amazed at the ingenuity of man in devising means to spend public money. Three hundred and eighty-five thousand two hundred and thirty-eight dollars and four cents, the contingent expenses of one session only! He said he had looked hastily over the items, and he found $152 for making pens; $39 50 for snuff; and $1,641 for horse-hire for the House of Representatives; and $314 for an hostler. In the Senate, for the same hire, $1,633, and upwards. He would not say that he had stated the above amounts with perfect accuracy, but the documents were before every gentleman, and he might examine for himself. It would seem, to a plain and upright man, who suspected no evil, that were you to inform him that this sum of $3,274 92 cents for horse-hire, and $314 for an hostler, was expended during one session, that this Congress actually legislated for the greater part of their time, at least, upon horse-back.

Sir, it is mockery, cruel mockery, to talk here about favoring the laboring class—the agriculturists; those from whom you draw, or extort would not be a phrase too hard, all the means for the extravagances around us; some thousands of dollars, Mr. President, for the very drapery over and around your chair, while the floor and every part of the Chamber presents equal extravagance. The money expended yearly within your iron-bound inclosure which surrounds your Capitol, he had not a doubt, was more than the yearly expenses of the government of the State in which he lived; he meant the proper charges for the government paid out of the State treasury. He did not wish now to look into the expenditures of the public money in the different departments of the Government; that stupendous mass of extravagance, corruption, and fraud which he feared existed, he left for others to examine; that there was something wrong somewhere all seemed now to admit; and, in his opinion, the fault was mainly, if not altogether, to be found in the legislation and acts of Congress. He had confined his views to the household economy of the body, to their furniture, the dress of their chambers, and their pin money alone; and he hoped they would begin the work of reformation and retrenchment at home; he thought they had "salted" the people quite sufficient in this branch of the public expenditures without adding to the amount $50,000 more or less for printing this salt document. He hoped the motion to rescind the order would prevail, and that the Senate would sustain him in a call for the yeas and nays on the vote; for, should he vote alone, he wished his name to appear against this extravagant and extraordinary expenditure of the public money.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. M., in reply to Mr. BENTON, said that he had not attended very closely to the observations of the gentleman at the commencement of his argument. After explaining his views, he should feel disposed to be satisfied with the decision of the Senate; and it was not his habit to again trouble the House, except new matter was brought forward, or his remarks were misunderstood, so as to produce a misrepresentation of them. But he now understood the gentleman to charge those opposed to this printing as being inimical to a repeal of the duty on salt, and thus against the interests of the agricultural classes; and that the people needed information to judge of the propriety of this repeal. Mr. M. said the people he represented understood very well their interests on this subject; they were in favor of a repeal of all duties on articles of necessity used by the great mass of the people—the laboring classes—such as salt, sugar, coal, and breadstuffs; but they did not consider the price of salt as onerous or oppressive. No one, he trusted, who examined this subject, not even a school-boy, could be made to believe that the duty of five or six cents on a bushel of imported salt increased the price of the domestic article. The western country could manufacture a sufficient quantity for their entire consumption; and the article was sold at as low a price as any one could desire. He thought—he could not speak with perfect certainty—that a bushel of domestic salt (fifty pounds) had been purchased, for years past, at an average price of forty to sixty cents; and those who used the foreign article, used it from choice, not necessity; and he did not think that it was generally understood that fifty pounds of the foreign article was more valuable to the agricultural class than the same quantity of the domestic. The farming interest of the West, he thought, would never complain of the price of salt while they could purchase three pounds of salt for one pound of flour. This had been the case in the West for some time past. For himself, he repelled the charge that this, or any act of his in this body or elsewhere, was done with a view, either directly or indirectly, to oppress, or affect injuriously, the agricultural class—a class amongst which he had been raised, and to whom he belonged. He was ready at once, with the Senator from Missouri, to repeal the duty on salt without the expense of this printing—an amount which the duty on all the salt used in the western country which paid duty, would not probably pay in many years to come. He would go further, and repeal the duty on sugar, coal, and breadstuffs, at once, and all other articles, even coarse woollens, which were used by the poor and laboring class. He considered some of these duties almost as unjust as to tax those classes for the air and sunshine which fell to their lot; and if the revenue would suffer in consequence of this report, he would increase it by an additional duty on articles of luxury, taste, and fashion—articles which produced extravagance, and not economy in this country—and he would lay duties only to meet the proper and necessary wants of the Government, but never for protection.

It was, however, said that these British documents, (the gentleman said that he had called them books when they were only documents, a distinction, he thought, without much difference,) that these documents would throw such light on the subject as to enable Congress to proceed correctly. He did not believe that we needed such light. The gentleman himself [Mr. BENTON] is fully competent to afford us sufficient information to enable us to judge correctly and justly, on this subject of repeal. Why, then, pay $50,000 to printers for information we do not need? It had been hinted that the compromise act, so called, with regard to the tariff, ought not now to be disturbed. He did not feel that his hands were tied by that act, so as to prevent him doing justice now. No! "let justice be done, though the heavens should fall."

Mr. M. begged of gentlemen to pause, and look back at what they had done. The amount paid for printing had been enormous. The post office reports—thirty thousand or more of that document had been printed, at some forty or fifty thousand dollars cost, with the view of enlightening the people as to the corruptions, as was said, in that department—what had this printing done? Furnished a job for a printer, and the whole story is told. They were so distributed; he had heard of their being used as wadding for cannon fired to celebrate Democratic victories! He thought it an effectual mode of distribution, and commended the inventor for his wit; but, in his part of the country, this document, with others, under which the mail coaches literally groaned, franked by members of Congress, were distributed in the country stores, and used as wrapping paper for tea and other articles sold in small quantities. Another charge for printing had been made some years ago of $20,000 or upwards, on a motion of a Senator from Alabama, to print the correspondence and papers of the Indian Bureau. A Senator near me says, name him; he said he had no objection—the Hon. Mr. Moore. He believed that the Senator who made the motion did not, nor had any other at the time, have an idea of the extent and cost of this work; it consisted, he believed, of many volumes; he had seen a Senator present his arms full of them to the Senate, and assert that the expense was larceny of the public money, a fraud upon the Treasury; and he thought the expression not too severe for the occasion. Thus we had gone on printing and distributing documents until the practice had become a serious drain upon the Treasury, and almost a nuisance to the country; they were used mostly, not for information, but as weapons of political warfare by contending parties, and having exhausted our own store, we are now to supply the vacuum from a foreign country. He hoped that gentlemen, if they did not intend to pull down this Administration, would not only make professions of economy and retrenchment, but would actually reduce it to practice, by beginning at home, here in Congress, the very fountain-head from whence all these streams of wasteful extravagance flow. He had been reminded that the farmers of his own neighborhood had suffered loss in the sale of their pork on account of the scarcity and price of salt the past fall. He admitted he had understood that the purchasers of pork were somewhat checked, and dealers in the article stood off for a while, under apprehension that it would be difficult to obtain a sufficient quantity of salt; but no one ever dreamed that this state of things was produced by the duty on imported salt. No, sir; we had abundance of salt in the country, and nothing but the lowness of the waters in our rivers prevented a full supply in the market. He said he would admit that pork was at a lower price now than it had been the last year, or was when the market first opened; but he would inform the gentleman of the cause of this change. It was not because we had not ordered a sufficient number of documents to be printed at the public expense; no such thing: it was to the labor of the gentleman here, and in which good work he has afforded all the aid in his power; it was by checking the banks in their wild career of speculation, and bringing back the inflated currency of the country to something like a reality. The value of money had risen, because the article had appeared something like it was of old, and genuine currency had taken the place of a fictitious one; and what the farmer could obtain for his pork now, had the name at least of being substantial, not quite so doubtful as formerly, which like Jonah's gourd, was liable to wither and die in a night. Now, sir, the farmer, with a good horse, common industry, and the distance not too great, might hope to receive his pay by obtaining at the bank the money for the paper he had received for his pork. He had no doubt but the country was much benefited, instead of being injured, by this change. He had conversed with sensible farmers and dealers, who both concurred in opinion with him on this subject; who were ready to tender their thanks to the Senator from Missouri, for the noble stand he had made in their favor, and he could assure the gentleman that he most cordially tendered his; but he could not join the gentleman now in printing documents to raise the price of pork, because he did not see any connection whatever between the two objects; and he remained still of opinion that the order for printing ought to be rescinded.

WISCONSIN CONTESTED ELECTION.

REMARKS OF HON. F. THOMAS, OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 3, 1839,

On the Wisconsin Contested Election.

The question was on the adoption of the following resolution of the Committee of Elections:

"Resolved, That James Duane Doty is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from Wisconsin Territory, and that George W. Jones is not so entitled."

Mr. THOMAS moved to amend the resolution by transposing the names, so as to declare Mr. Jones entitled to the seat; and proceeded at length to oppose the conclusions of the report.

Mr. T. said that, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, he had been compelled at a former session to examine very generally the laws relating to the Territories. Knowing this, the sitting Delegate from Wisconsin had requested him to participate in this discussion. I do so, sir, foreseeing that the opinion I entertain will not be sanctioned by a vote of the majority of the House. The Committee of Elections, with great unanimity, has reported in favor of the petitioner, and against the sitting member; and there is, we all know, a predisposition in many members to acquiesce in the decision of a committee. In this case, too, we who oppose the report of the committee labor under another serious disadvantage. There is nothing to be gained by either political party in the issue of this question. And hence a very strong inducement felt in most cases for attending to a discussion "designed" to reverse a report of a committee does not exist in this instance. Notwithstanding I have these reasons to fear that my remarks will not be very patiently listened to by the majority, and although I foresee that defeat awaits us, I shall stand up for what I think the right cause.

The committee in this case have failed to perform one of the most important objects for which this subject was referred. They have not informed the House whether there has been heretofore a contest for a seat as a Delegate from a Territory, that we might profit by the opinions of our predecessors. I propose to supply this omission. I will call the attention of the House to a contested election which gave rise to an act of Congress applicable to the Territory of Wisconsin, and designed, in my opinion, to guard against the occurrence of a contest like this now under consideration.

On the 4th of June, 1812, an act of Congress passed, authorizing the citizens of Missouri Territory to elect one Delegate to the Congress of the United States. Nothing was said in the act as to the time when the service of such Delegate should commence or terminate. The power given to the people of Missouri under this law was exercised, and Rufus Easton, having been duly elected, took his seat at the second session of the Thirteenth Congress, and continued to act as a Delegate during that and the first session of the Fourteenth Congress. At the second session of the Fourteenth Congress, John Scott appeared and claimed the seat as a Delegate from Missouri, he having a certificate of election from the Governor of the Territory. His right was contested by Mr. Easton, his competitor at the election, who maintained that the election had been illegally conducted. The House, after a full examination of the whole matter, "Resolved, That the election in the Territory of Missouri has been illegally conducted, and "the seat of the Delegate from that Territory is vacant." No objection was urged on that occasion to the right claimed by Mr. Scott upon the ground now taken by the sitting Delegate from Wisconsin. The law under which the Delegates from Missouri had been elected, contained no provision like that in the law to which I shall presently refer. There was nothing to be found at that time, either in the Constitution of the United States, or the laws defining the term of a Delegate from a Territory. The Constitution had conferred upon Congress the power to "make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." And in pursuance of this authority, Congress had established a government for the Territory of Missouri, and given to the citizens therein a right to elect a Delegate; but Congress had not declared when the time of service of such Delegate should either commence or terminate. There was nothing in the law or the Constitution authorizing a Delegate to sit more than one year, or forbidding him to sit more than two years, or five years, under one and the same election. Upon this point, the legislation of Congress was manifestly defective. The contest for a seat from Missouri directed attention to this imperfection; and a law was passed to guard against the inconveniences and irregularities which, without it would be unavoidable. I hold that act now in my hand. I invite the attention of the House to its provisions. It is not referred to in the report of the Committee of Elections in this case, and may have escaped attention. It was approved by the President on the 3d of March, 1817, fifty days after the Missouri contest had been disposed of. The first section, which alone relates to the question now before the House, declares: "That in every Territory of the United States in which a temporary government has been, or hereafter shall be, established, and which, by virtue of the ordinance of Congress of the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, or of any subsequent act of Congress, passed or to be passed, now hath, or hereafter shall have, the right to send a Delegate to Congress, such Delegate shall be elected every second year, for the same term of two years, for which members of the House of Representatives of the United States are elected." This language is explicit, unequivocal. All delegates from the Territories then existing, or to be established, are to hold their seats for the same term of two years for which members of this House are elected. What is that term? When does it commence? When does it terminate? These questions are settled beyond controversy. The term of a member of this House commences on the 4th of March, and terminates on the 3d of March two years next succeeding. Within those periods, whenever the Congress assembles of which an individual is a duly elected member, he takes his seat in the body. By the act of 1817, these privileges are extended to the Delegates from all the Territories then existing, or to be established. They have a right to sit in the Congress of which they are duly elected members whenever it assembles between the 4th of March, when its term commences, and the 3d of that March, when its term ends.

I am aware, sir, that there is another act of Congress, concerning the Delegate from Wisconsin, to be taken into consideration. But upon an examination of its provisions, it will be found that they do not conflict with those of the act of 1817. It still stands upon the statute-book unaltered, not repealed by subsequent legislation, so far as Wisconsin is concerned; and must be considered, as it was obviously intended to be, as a fundamental law for all the Territories. That the House may judge of the accuracy of this opinion, I will read that part of the law to which I allude. It is an act passed on the 20th of April, 1836, "establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin." The fourteenth section of the act alone relates to the Delegate to this House, and declares, "That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve for the term of two years, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly, who shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as have been granted to the Delegates from the several Territories of the United States to the said House of Representatives."

There does not appear to be anything here repealing or modifying the act of 1817. On the contrary, this section seems to have been framed with a knowledge of the existence of that fundamental law; otherwise, the member who drafted this section would be chargeable with gross negligence. It does not attempt to define the term for which the Delegate shall be chosen. He is to serve for the term of two years; but it is not said when that term is to begin and end. We must look elsewhere for that; and to aid us in the search, this law of 1836, in the section I have just read, declares that the Delegates "shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as have been granted to the Delegates from the several Territories." Now, what are those rights and privileges? Where are they to be found? We must not look for them in the act creating the Michigan Territory, nor to the act establishing Iowa. Those are special acts, confined to those Territories respectively; and as we are in search of rights and privileges which have been granted to the Delegates from the several Territories of the United States, we must look to some general fundamental law applicable to all the Territories. That law we find in the act of the 3d of March, 1817, passed to correct an inconvenience and irregularity growing out of careless legislation in the case of the Missouri Territory, and intended to guard against the possibility of a contest such as that the House is now considering.

There is language to be found in another section of the act of 1836, establishing a territorial government for Wisconsin, that may be relied on in maintenance of the opinion that the provisions of the act of 1817, which we have been considering, are not applicable to that Territory. In the twelfth section of that law, it is declared that "the said inhabitants shall also be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Michigan, and to its inhabitants; and the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act." In one of the laws of Michigan, (act 16th February, 1819,) there is a section directing the Governor of that Territory to furnish to the Delegate elect a certificate of his election, and declaring that such Delegate shall be entitled to a seat in Congress "for the term of two years from the date of said certificate;" and it is contended that this law of Michigan has, by the provisions of the twelfth section of the act of 1836, been extended over Wisconsin. A moment's examination must show the fallacy of such an opinion. The twelfth section of the act of 1836, relates to the inhabitants of the Territory. In it their rights and privileges are defined; but in the fourteenth section of the same law, we are to look for the rights and privileges of the Delegate, and we there find that they are as great, and not greater, than those granted, not to the Delegate from Michigan, but "to the Delegates from the several Territories of the United States." Moreover, in the twelfth section of the act of 1836, we have these words: Speaking of the laws of Michigan, it is said that they shall be extended over Wisconsin "so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act." Take, then, both these sections of the act of 1836 into consideration, adopting a well-established rule of construction, and let us see what is the conclusion to be necessarily reached. The law of Michigan gave to the Delegate from that Territory a right to a term in Congress for two years from the date of the Governor's certificate. The fourteenth section of the act of 1836 confers expressly upon the Delegate from Wisconsin the right to a term in Congress like that secured to the Delegates from the several Territories of the United States. The twelfth section of the act of 1836 extends over Wisconsin all the laws of Michigan, "not incompatible with the provisions" of that act. The duration of the term in the law of Michigan differs from, and is "incompatible" with the duration of the term in the twelfth section of the act relating to Wisconsin, and is not, therefore, extended over said Territory.

Having assigned these reasons for believing that the act of 1817 is a fundamental law applicable to the Territory of Wisconsin; that it has not been repealed or altered by the act of 1836; and having stated why I believe that the two years' term of service, to which the Delegate from Wisconsin has a right in the present Congress, commences and terminates at the same periods with the terms of the members from the several States, I will next inquire whether General Jones is entitled to hold the seat he now occupies to the close of the present session. He was elected by the people of Wisconsin in October, 1836. About the same time the members of this House from Ohio and Pennsylvania were chosen. As their rights to seats are not contested, it will not be pretended that he has no right because the election was held in Wisconsin before the term of service was to commence. He appeared here at the first session of the present Congress, was qualified according to the established forms of our proceedings, and took his seat. The House did not adopt a formal resolution declaring that he was entitled to sit therein as a Delegate to the Twenty-Fifth Congress from Wisconsin; but this was done in effect. He was called upon by the Presiding Officer, as the other members, to take the oath of office, and we sat by and witnessed the proceeding, assenting thereto as fully as we could have done by a viva voce vote. The House was engaged in the exercise of that high power derived from the "fifth section and first article of the Constitution." We were judging of "the elections, returns, and qualifications" of the members. And we decided that George W. Jones was duly elected a Delegate from Wisconsin, and acquiesced in his appearance amongst us to take his seat as such. We adjudged that he was duly qualified. Such being the facts, I am at some loss to conjecture in what part of the Constitution, in what law, or in what usage is to be found the power to adopt a resolution declaring that James B. Doty is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from Wisconsin. There cannot be two Delegates from one Territory in Congress at the same time. For the power to admit Mr. Doty, I have examined the report of the Committee of Elections, but I find nothing there to satisfy my mind. In that report I find much to prejudice and bewilder the judgment, which ought not to have been introduced. It serves not to enlighten, but to confuse. We are there told that if General Jones is permitted to occupy this seat until the present session closes, he will have been a member of Congress for three regular sessions under one election. If this were true what possible influence should it have upon the judgments of men sitting here as a judicial tribunal. We are not to decide whether General Jones sat in the last Congress with or without legal authority. Each Congress is to judge of the election and qualification of its own members. If the last Congress decided that General Jones was entitled to take his seat therein as a Delegate, and erred in that decision, can we correct that error by usurping a power to dismiss him now, if he be entitled to this seat? That he is so entitled, we have already decided at the first session of this Congress. We said that he is duly elected a member of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, and this decision gave him a title to be in his seat whenever the Twenty-Fifth Congress is in session. But, sir, I maintain that he was not duly qualified as a Delegate to the Twenty-Fourth Congress from Wisconsin. He had been elected as a Delegate to the Twenty-Fourth Congress from Michigan. Under that election, he appeared and was qualified at the first session of that Congress. Michigan did not come into the Union until January, 1837, subsequent to the time when General Jones took the oath as a Delegate from Wisconsin. The oath of office was therefore void. He could not be a representative from two Territories at one and the same moment; and being a qualified Delegate from Michigan at the second session of the last Congress, he could not, without resigning that office, legally qualify and take another. But, I again ask, what have these irregular proceedings to do with the question now to be decided? We are now called upon to construe laws. We are acting judicially; and whether the last Congress acted right or not, is a question which we need not now debate. Instead of attempting to rectify the errors of our predecessors, we should be guarding against error in ourselves. We have the laws, we have the Constitution before us. We are acting as sworn judges in the premises, and have simply to decide this question according to the dictates of an unbiased reason. I know well that I and those who concur with me in these views are to be found in a minority. But minorities have no terrors for me. Those acts of my political life to which I recur with most pride and pleasure, were when I had few, very few, indeed, to countenance heartily the proceeding. I belong not to that class of men who are "preserved from shame" only "by numbers on their side."

THE GRADUATION BILL.

SPEECH OF HON. T. H. BENTON, OF MISSOURI,

IN SENATE, January 4, 1839,

On the Graduation bill, and in reply to Mr. CLAY's attacks upon General Jackson.

Mr. BENTON rose, in consequence of the endless attacks made upon an eminent citizen, now retired from public life, and seeking repose under his own vine, and by the side of his own fire, but for whom, it would seem, there was to be no peace on this side of the grave. He alluded to the late President of the United States, General Jackson, and to the repeated instances in which his name had been dragged into this debate, and tyranny and mischief attributed to him for his conduct in relation to the act for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. That conduct had been denounced as tyrannical and unconstitutional, and to it had been attributed all the late moneyed embarrassments of the country. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] is the author of these denunciations, and also the author of the bills, for there were two of them, the loss of which he so much deplores, and for the want of which he has seen so much evil arise. I (said Mr. B.) was the contemporary of these bills. I knew their character and their fate; I saw their birth and their death, and great and numerous as are the acts which stamp the character of a hero-statesman on General Jackson, there are none which exalt him more than his conduct in relation to these very bills. It was wise, patriotic, constitutional, and heroic conduct. He had the wisdom to see the pernicious nature of these bills; he had the constitutional right to arrest them; and he had the heroism to exercise that right. The bills were of the most seductive character; they were calculated to seduce all unreflecting minds; for they proposed a distribution, among the people, of near sixty or seventy millions of dollars. The distribution would have left the Treasury bare; it would have bankrupted the deposit banks; it might have debauched the States; it would have compelled a resort to loans or a new tariff; and it would have set the fatal example of lavishing the public money, and also the public property, upon the people on the eve of the presidential elections. The first bill passed the two Houses in 1832, just before the presidential election, and so near the end of the session of Congress that the President had but a few hours, instead of the ten days which the Constitution allowed him, to examine its provisions, to make up his mind upon it, and to return it to the Senate with his objections in writing, if disapproved by him. It was retained by him the ten days, as he had a clear constitutional right to do. Congress did not think proper to prolong its session to cover those ten days, as it might have done; for it was the session whose duration was not limited by the Constitution; and the two Houses having adjourned, he retained the bill until the next session, and then returned it to the House in which it originated with his objections to it. This was the regular course prescribed by the Constitution; and, thanks to the spirit and intelligence of the people, it was the course sanctioned and approved by them. Instead of being excited against the patriot President by an affected outcry against "pocketing bills," and by a per capita calculation of the money each voter had lost, so ostentatiously paraded before their eyes—instead of being excited against General Jackson by those means, and made to cast their votes against him, the high-minded people of our America approved his conduct, and testified their approbation in the distinguished honor of his second election. This was the fate of the first bill. It was to have taken the whole proceeds of the sales of the public lands for five years—the years 1833–'34–'35–'36–'37—and divided them among the States; leaving the Treasury entirely dependent upon the custom-house duties for its support, which many then saw, and experience has since proved, would be wholly inadequate, without a resort to a new tariff, loans, or Treasury notes, to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government.

The second bill was a duplicate of the first, but four years its junior in point of time; it did not come on until the approach of the presidential election in 1836, but was made to cover the same number of years, and the same identical years, which were covered by the first one. To do this, it was necessary to make this second bill retroact, make it reach back, and exact from the Treasury as much money as the first bill would have taken out of it up to that time, and then for as many more years as would complete the original five. In fact, it was the same bill, in every particular, with the superaddition of the signal aggravation of being retroactive, and getting hold of three years' revenue from the lands for a grand distribution on the eve of the approaching presidential election. This was the character of the second bill; and this character is too important and too necessary to be understood by the people for their knowledge of it to rest upon description. They must see it. They must see the thing itself and know of their own knowledge what it was that fell—or fall it did—before the stern resolve of General Jackson, and the loss of which is now deplored as a national calamity. The people must see it; and here it is in the book of the bills of the Senate, which I have this moment sent a messenger to bring me from the office of the Secretary.

It is entitled "An act to divide among the States, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands," &c.; and the signature of the then Secretary of the Senate, Walter Lowrie, Esq., that it passed this body on the 12th day of May, 1836. I read from the third and fourth sections, which show the parts which are material to the present inquiry.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several sums of money received in the Treasury as the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the years eighteen hundred and thirty-three, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, and eighteen hundred and thirty-five, shall be paid and distributed as aforesaid, at the Treasury of the United States, one fourth part on the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and one fourth part at the end of each ninety days thereafter, until the whole is paid; and those which shall be received for the years eighteen hundred and thirty-six and eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, shall also be paid at the Treasury half yearly, on the first day of July and January, in each of those years, to such person or persons as the respective Legislatures of the said States shall authorize and direct to receive the same.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, unless the United States shall become involved in war with any foreign Power, in which event, from the commencement of hostilities, this act shall cease, and be no longer in force."

These are the sections of the act of 1836—the act which sunk before the firm resolve of President Jackson—sunk before his resolve; for it died under his known opinion in respect to it, and without having reached his hand. It was the copy of the one which he had retained, and which he had returned with his objections. It was known to be useless to send it to him unless there was a majority of two thirds for it in each House. Such a majority could not be conciliated; and the bill, after becoming an act of the Senate, died out in the House of Representatives, and was succeeded by another act in the Senate to accomplish a part of its purpose; namely, the bill to distribute, under the name of a deposit, thirty-six millions of public moneys among the States. This latter became a law; it was only about one half the magnitude of its predecessor and progenitor—the five years' land revenue distribution bill. It was only half the magnitude of that bill; but the one half of it, even, was enough to crush the great deposit banks.

I was one of a few who opposed all three of these bills; and especially I opposed the one from which two sections have just been read, and for the loss of which General Jackson has been so incontinently denounced on this floor, and for the want of which so many evils have been asserted to have arisen. I join issue upon these assertions. I denounce this bill now, as I did when it was on its passage, as a bill that would have bankrupted the deposit banks, and bankrupted the Treasury, and laid the Government under the necessity of reviving the tariff, or borrowing money to defray its ordinary daily and current expenses. These were my declarations then, when the bill was on its passage in May, 1836; and I expressed myself with such earnestness with respect to the danger to the banks and the Treasury, that a member of the Senate and a friend now present, suggested that they would alarm the country if published as delivered; and, in consequence, the speech was but partially and imperfectly reported. The bill died in the House of Representatives; it never became a law; I was satisfied, and should never have troubled the Senate and the country with a revival of the subject, had it not been now revived by the author of the bill, for the purpose of attributing to it a vast merit, and for the purpose of reiterating upon General Jackson an oft-repeated denunciation. The defunct bill is resuscitated by its author—resuscitated to claim our sympathies, as a measure of beneficence to the country, and to excite our resentment against General Jackson, as the destroyer of so fine a measure! Revived, resuscitated, dug up from its grave in this manner, and for these purposes, it becomes a legitimate subject for parliamentary animadversion; and I mean to advert upon it freely, closely, and truly, that the country may not only see what it is they are called upon to regret, and to censure General Jackson for destroying, but also to enable all men who are of "sound mind and memory," to judge for themselves what this country would come to if its destinies were in the hands of the friends and supporters of such a bill!

I now address myself to the candor and intelligence of all parties in this Chamber and out of it, and invoke their attention and the decision of their minds on the case which will be presented. The bill, in its third section, provides first for the distribution of the money which had been received from the sales of the public lands for the three preceding years, and which money had already, in great part, been expended by the Government. It ordered the amounts received from the lands in the years 1833, 1834, and 1835, to be divided out; the division to commence on the 1st day of July next ensuing, and to be accomplished in four installments, at ninety days apart. This was one clause of the bill, and the amount on which it would have operated was $23,582,882; that is to say, the sum of $3,967,682 for 1833; the sum of $4,857,600 for 1834; and the sum of $14,757,460 for 1835. This would have made the sum of nearly six millions, in round numbers, payable out of the Treasury at intervals of ninety days, to wit: on the first days of July, October, January, and April. The whole sum of $23,500,000 would have been payable in the short space of about nine months, and that in addition to the $31,000,000 which would be required for the service of the Government during the same year. So much for one branch of the distribution clause. The second branch of it ordered the proceeds of the land sales for the years 1836 and 1837 to be also divided out, but by a half yearly instead of quarterly process. The first payment was to be made on the 1st of July ensuing, being the same day on which the quarterly payments began; the second was to be made on the 1st of January, 1837, being the same day on which the third quarterly payment became due; the third half payment was to be made on the 1st of July, 1837; and the fourth on the 1st of January, 1838. Now, what is the amount which this second branch of the distribution clause would have diverted from the Treasury, and in what time? Sir, the amount would have been $31,653,380, and the time would have been eighteen months. Such would have been the amount payable in that short time; for the sales of the lands in 1836 were $24,877,179; and for 1837 they were $6,776,236, and this in addition to the sum required for the service of the Government in 1837, which was $39,000,000. The whole amount which would have been required for distribution between the 1st of July, 1836, and the 1st of January, 1838, would have been $55,336,360; and the service of the Government for the same time would have required just about as much more. A table of dates and sums will show the amount and distribution of these enormous calls for money.

This table exhibits the detail and the gross of the amounts which would have been taken from the Treasury in eighteen months, if the land bill of 1836 had passed, with the detail and the gross also of what was actually required for the service of the Government for the same time. They amount, in round numbers, to $55,000,000 for distribution, and $55,000,000 for the support of Government; in all $110,000,000!

Now, sir, how was the Treasury to stand this enormous call? It could not have stood it at all! It could not have stood the first pull—the first $17,250,000 for distribution, and $7,750,000 for the public service; which would have been required on the first day of July, 1836. It would have failed at that payment; and so I declared, and, in my own opinion, demonstrated at that time; and so the event proved, when the deposit act passed, and substituted a smaller and later distribution. This deposit act passed in June of 1836; it began to take effect in January, 1837; it proposed to divide out but $36,000,000, and that by $9,000,000 at a time, and to commence the distribution six months later than the land bill proposed; and yet what was the result? The result was the stoppage of the principal deposit banks, and all the rest of the banks within five months after the distribution began to take effect! The deposit banks made the first distribution in January; they nearly sunk under the second installment in April; they were unable to meet the third one in July, and closed their doors in May; and, while several causes contributed to the result, yet it must never be forgotten that the committee of the New York banks, where the stoppage began, in enumerating the four principal causes for that event, placed at the head of those causes, the operation of the deposit or distribution act of June, 1836. Thus, experience proved: that the deposit banks could not stand a distribution of $36,000,000, commencing six months later than the proposed land bill distribution, and made in quarterly installments of only $9,000,000 at a time. How then could they have stood a distribution of $55,000,000, commencing six months earlier, and the first installment amounting to $17,250,000? The thing was impossible; it could not be done; and that was so evident to me that I proclaimed it, and reiterated my opinion on this floor in language too strong, in the judgment of some of my friends, to be allowed to go to the country; and what was that opinion bottomed upon? Upon the fact known to us all, and by me repeated a thousand times, that what was called a surplus of $40,000,000 in the Treasury was a mere delusion; that the money, in point of fact, was not in the deposit banks; that it had been lent out; that Congress had sanctioned and instigated the lending, by requiring interest from the banks for its use; that, instead of being in the banks, it was in the hands of merchants, traders, dealers, manufacturers, mechanics, speculators, and others; that the banks had used it with the knowledge of Congress, and with the implied contract and fair understanding of having the use of it till gradually called for on account of the public service; and that, to call for all this money in masses, and almost without notice (for the first payment would have begun as soon as the bill could have been passed) was to COMPEL THE LARGE DEPOSIT BANKS TO CHOOSE BETWEEN STOPPING PAYMENT THEMSELVES, OR DESTROYING THEIR DEBTORS. All this was so plain to me that it was amazing, incomprehensible, and almost incredible that any person could avoid seeing the same. Yet this is the measure, the loss of which we are called upon to deplore. This is the measure, the patriotic resistance of which, by General Jackson, is denounced as an act of tyranny. This is the measure, then believed to be irresistibly popular, now known to be heartily condemned by every considerate man. This is the measure before which General Jackson, and all its opponents, were expected to be prostrated, and before which they were willing to have been prostrated if such had been the penalty of adherence to their principles; this is the measure which, like the consular distributions of grain and money, and public lands, among the voters in the degenerate days of the Roman Republic, was expected to purchase the suffrages of all the people. General Jackson and his friends, myself one of them, did what they believed was right, in resisting this measure, without regard to consequences personal to themselves. They resisted the colossal distribution of $55,000,000 of money. They threw themselves upon the intelligence, the patriotism, and the candor of their fellow-countrymen; and the event has proved that they were not mistaken in their estimate of that candor, that intelligence, and that patriotism. It has proved that the American people are not yet ready to be seduced and debauched with the spoils and pillage of their own country.

Sir, (said Mr. B.) I pursue this bill of May, 1836, one step further; I pursue it into the fourth section, and see that nothing but a war with a foreign Power could have arrested the distribution of the $55,000,000, and given the Treasury a right to retain the $24,877,179 received from the public lands in 1836, and the $6,776,236 received from them in 1837. By the terms of the act, the distribution was to go on without regard to anything but a foreign war, and the $32,000,000 received from the lands in 1836 and 1837 were to belong to the States, and to be paid to them without the least regard to the condition of the public Treasury. It was a specific appropriation of the proceeds of the lands, and as such would have been paid over to the States on the days named in the act. The "shutting up" of the Treasury would have made no difference; the stoppage of the banks would have made no difference; there was no foreign war—the appropriation was specific and absolute—and the delivery of the money to the States would have been compulsory and inevitable. What then? Why, that notwithstanding the retroactive disbursements from the Treasury of the before received revenues from the lands of 1833, 1834, and 1835—notwithstanding the attempt to disburse these old expended revenues might have bankrupted the deposit banks—yet the current receipts from the lands for 1836 and 1837 would have been turned over to the States as they came in. The $25,000,000 (nearly) of 1836 would have gone to the States; the $7,000,000 (nearly) of 1837 would have gone to them also; and thus, with the banks all stopped—with the Treasury shut up—with Congress called together to provide the ways and means of keeping the Government in motion—with the duties from customs sinking down to nothing—merchants' duty-bonds postponed—balances from banks delayed for many months; with all these we should have been paying out to the States the $7,000,000 of hard money received from the lands in 1837, and which $7,000,000 in specie was the sheet-anchor of the Government in that disastrous year, and the only thing which saved it from the degradation and ruin of using depreciated paper money and shipplasters.

Mr. President, we hear much of the incapacity, the ignorance, the incompetency, and the recklessness of the Jackson administration; we hear much of all this from the Opposition, without their being able to specify a measure to which these epithets will apply; but here is an act of the Opposition itself, which places the leaders in a position to choose between a confession of absolute incapacity to manage the public affairs, or of a deliberate design to bankrupt the Treasury and the banks.

No, Mr. President, the Jackson administration was not ignorant, was not reckless, was not incompetent; and to hurl such epithets at that Administration is to hurl them at the people, by whom that Administration was created and has been sustained. To attack that Administration, approved as it was in the triumphant second election of General Jackson, and in the triumphant election of his successor, is to attack the capacity of the people for self-government! It is to attack the elective principle of our Constitution, and to say that that principle ought to be abolished, and a hereditary ruler given as a guardian to those who were so incompetent to choose their own Chief Magistrate.

No, sir! Great are the services which General Jackson has rendered to his country—great in the field—still greater in the Cabinet. His civil administration was a continued series of patriotic exertions, the emanation no less of a heroic soul than of a sagacious head and a patriot heart. None but a hero could have acted the part, in civil affairs, which he did. Above all men who have lived in our eventful times, a single individual, perhaps, alone accepted, he will be stamped the hero-statesman of the age. I have heretofore endeavored to do some justice to his various, transcendent, and victorious policy. I have endeavored to present some views of his numerous, brilliant, and successful ameliorations at home, and negotiations abroad. I have endeavored to present him as posterity will view him, covered, illustrated, irradiated with every species of glory, and above all, with the glory of usefulness—with the glory of having improved the condition, bettered the circumstances, advanced the fortune, and personally benefited every industrious inhabitant which the country contains. I have endeavored to do this; and I appeal to the present unparalleled, unrivaled, unprecedented, unexampled, universal, pervading, and exulting prosperity of the country for the truth and fidelity of the pictures which I have endeavored to draw.

It is not my intention to repeat, on the present occasion, what I have heretofore delivered on this subject; but there is one point which, though heretofore mentioned, has never been presented with the fullness, individuality, and development which its importance and magnitude deserves: I allude to our cotton production, and its influence upon the wealth and industry of every portion of this extended Union, and the part which General Jackson has acted in bringing that production to what it now is, and to what it must be. What was the extent of our cotton-growing territory before the victorious arms of General Jackson acquired for us the vast region of the South and Southwest? It was a part of South Carolina, a part of Georgia, some slips in North Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana. What is it now? It is all Florida, all Georgia, all Alabama, all Mississippi, all Louisiana, all Arkansas, South Carolina, a part of North Carolina, a third of Tennessee, and a slip in Missouri. In territorial extent our cotton-growing region has been increased more than ten fold by the victorious arms of General Jackson over the southern Indians, and by his still more victorious policy over the political allies of those Indians—their Federal allies—whose struggle it was to retain them in the southern States to diminish their political importance, and to cripple their advance. What was the value of our cotton export before these great operations of General Jackson began? It was $14,000,000. What is it now? It is $80,000,000. And what is its capacity of augmentation? Almost limitless and boundless, or only limited by the wants of Europe, Asia, Africa, and the two Americas; for to all these countries, even to the Ganges and the Black Sea, to the Cape of Good Hope, and to Terra del Fuego do our American cottons now go. And what is the influence of this vast production, so amazingly augmented under the victorious arms, and still more victorious policy, of ONE MAN; what is its influence upon the industry, the pursuits, and the wealth of every part of this extended Confederacy? To answer this question, let the mind's eye figure to itself a map of this Union, and then contemplate every species of industry which is carried on upon the vast diversified domain which it represents. Let him look at our shipping interest from the Chesapeake to Passamaquoddy bay, all finding its greatest and richest employment in carrying our cotton abroad, and bringing back the productions of so many nations received in exchange for it. Let him see our most opulent merchants throughout the whole extent of our coast, from New Orleans to New York, all bottoming their largest operations upon the cotton of the South. Look to the manufacturing industry of the whole northeast, of which Massachusetts may be taken as an example, and as the highest pattern; manufactures of leather, cotton, wool, iron, brass, tin, wood, glass, stone, &c., the grand aggregate of which, in all the northeast, may be judged of from the annual product of near ninety million dollars for Massachusetts alone; and a goodly proportion of the whole of which finds its market in the same cotton-growing region. Crossing the Alleghany mountains, and descending upon the western waters, see twelve millions of manufactured articles, the product of the industry of three or four miles square at the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongahela; see these twelve millions annually going off from Pittsburgh, and the largest part going to the cotton planters of the South; while many other towns and villages of the West, on a smaller scale, emulate the meritorious example of "the Birmingham of the West." Then, see the agricultural States of the great valley. See Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, with their vast productions of grain, and their innumerable herds and flocks, all finding their richest market in the same region. Turning to the middle States, where the value of labor, for a long time, has been so much reduced, we see that value in Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, and Tennessee has found a vast augmentation from the cultivation of cotton. So that, in every part of this extended Confederacy, and over every species of creative industry, the augmented cultivation of cotton, the fruit of General Jackson's military achievements and civil policy, has extended its benefits, and shed its benign influences. The North, the East, the West, and the Middle States; the cities and the country; agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; all, all find employment for their industry, and rich rewards for their skill and labor in that perennial fountain of national wealth—the cotton-growing region of the South—which, while it showers gold upon all others, is itself largely deprived of its own advantages by illusive systems of political economy, a system which leads it to purchase everything by the paper money standard of the United States, while it sells the only article it produces by the hard-money standard of Europe! Every part of this Union feels the beneficial effects of the cotton crops; and no part feels it more than the agricultural region of Kentucky, and the manufacturing districts of Massachusetts.

I have lately traveled in Kentucky, and speak from the knowledge of my own senses. I have lately received an authentic return of the annual manufactures of Massachusetts, and speak upon unimpeachable authority. Kentucky and Massachusetts are the two States of this Union which have profited most by the military victories and the civil administration of General Jackson; they are the two States of this Union which owe most to his arms and to his policy; they are the two States of this Union which should be bound to him by the strongest ties of gratitude and affection. The agriculturist of Kentucky is now on the high road to wealth; his prosperity reposes upon a solid and imperishable basis. His cattle, his mules, his horses, his hemp, all wanted in the South, command the highest price, fill his coffers with vast sums of money, and reflect upon his lands an unprecedented value. It is no longer the illusions of the high tariff; it is no longer the illusions of the "golden fleece," two thousand dollars for a sheep, intrinsically worth twenty shillings, and now sunk to that price; it is no longer the deceptive dream of these ephemeral illusions which tickled and beguiled the Kentuckian before Jackson's administration, but it is now the solid basis of the cotton cultivation in the South, and free trade in Europe, upon which his prosperity reposes. Let him cultivate the cotton-grower, and cherish free trade abroad, and never again fall into the illusions of high tariff and national bank, and never again will he see his crops rotting on his hands, his property sinking to no price, his currency depreciated one half, and piles of property laws, tender laws, relief laws, and stay laws interposed between the hapless debtor and the merciless creditor. So much for Kentucky; and equal with hers, and resting, in good part, upon the same basis, is the prosperity of Massachusetts. The cotton-grower of the South takes a part of all that she has to spare. From "brushes, brooms, and baskets, and buttons of all kinds," up to her eighteen millions of dollars worth of manufactures in shoes, boots, and leather; her seventeen millions of manufactures of cotton; her ten millions of manufactures of wool; her nine millions and a half of fish and oil; her two millions of ready-made clothing, stocks, and suspenders; her two millions and a half of nails, brads, and tacks; her million and a half of soap and candles; her million and a half of paper; her million and a quarter of rum; her million of refined sugar; her two millions of straw bonnets and palm leaf hats; and many other articles "too tedious to enumerate," but amounting, in conjunction with those enumerated, to eighty-six millions of dollars per annum. From all these she sends a part to the cotton-grower, and doubtless gets a better part of the crop than the grower himself receives; an advantage which is the fair and legitimate fruit of industry, conducted by skill, guarded by economy, and diversified by enterprise. It was the last year of President Jackson's administration—the year ending the 31st day of March, 1837—which presented this magnificent result of Massachusetts manufacturing industry; I say manufacturing, for the proceeds of her commerce and agriculture are not included; and this grand result will forever stand as a proof of the prosperity of the country under the sagacious policy of that illustrious statesman.

Sir, it was no part of my intention to make a eulogy upon General Jackson. The time is coming when history, and poetry, and sculpture, and painting, and the living voices of endless generations will do him that service. I make no general eulogy. I have spoken to a single point, to show from one example the beneficent nature of his policy, and the universality of its happy influence upon all parts of our country, and upon all the pursuits of its industry. I have spoken to a single point, and have not exhausted that one, for to this same cotton region we are indebted for the hundred millions of gold and silver which has sustained the country and the Government in the late shock, and which hereafter are to render the people independent of the rise and fall of banks, and safe from the shocks and explosions of the paper system. What I have said has been forced out of me by attacks, as wanton as they are incessant, upon the hero-patriot who is entitled to repose, now that he has withdrawn from the world and given an example of the manner in which an ex-President of the United States should spend the evening of his days, and close up the career of his life.

THE SWARTWOUT DEFALCATION.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE,

January 8, 1838.

The resolution of Mr. CAMBRELENG, for a Select Committee to investigate the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, having come up as the unfinished business, together with the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. WISE—

Mr. WISE modified his amendment by adopting a resolution offered some days since by Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, in the following words:

"Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, to consist of nine members, to be appointed by ballot, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the causes and extent of the late defalcations of the custom-house at New York and other places; the length of time they have existed; the correctness of the returns which have been made by the collectors, and naval and other officers, and the deposit banks respectively; and all such facts connected with said defalcations as may be deemed material to develop their true character.

"Be it further resolved, That said committee be required to inquire into, and make report of, any defalcations among the collectors, receivers, and disbursers of the public money, which may now exist; who are the defaulters; the amount of defalcations; the length of time they have existed; and the causes which led to them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. EVERETT said that, as it would be necessary, if any investigation was to take place this session, that it should be entered on without delay, he hoped the resolution would be voted on at once; and he demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMBRELENG accepted the modification proposed by Mr. GARLAND, except so much as related to the mode of appointing the committee. While up he would take the opportunity to notice some remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] That gentleman expressed surprise that he (Mr. C.) had not included the defalcations of Mr. Price and General Gratiot in his motion for inquiry. He did not for the obvious reason that he was not aware of them. If the gentleman from Virginia had consulted his colleague, [Mr. MERCER,] he could have informed him that he (Mr. C.) had subsequently proposed to him to include both these cases. The gentleman might make the inquiry as broad as he pleased; he was himself disposed to give latitude for the most extensive examination. The gentleman from Virginia had also ascribed to the motion he had offered a design to "whitewash" the Secretary of the Treasury. He was surprised at this charge, when he had expressly declared, in submitting the motion, that he had no desire whatever to serve as a member of the committee, and that nothing short of an order of the House would compel him to do so. If there was any "whitewashing" to be done, he should have no share in it. The gentleman had further imputed to the Speaker a design to pack the committee for the purpose of protecting the Secretary of the Treasury. If (said Mr. C.) there is any weight in such suspicions, what is the attitude of the gentleman's colleague? [Mr. GARLAND.] He moves that a committee be appointed by ballot, to inquire into the most stupendous fraud that has ever been committed, and that, too, by one of his own political friends—a notorious Conservative—a uniform and bitter enemy of the present Chief Magistrate before and since his original appointment. Before he was appointed I remonstrated against it, in a letter to the President, and then predicted his defalcation. But, sir, Mr. Swartwout is not the only Conservative friend whom the gentleman from Virginia, as I apprehend, will find involved in this defalcation. One of the most important duties to be performed by this committee will be to ascertain whether other Conservatives did not participate in the fruits of this fraud. He did not believe that this large amount, near a million and a half, had ever been taken for his own use exclusively. He was much mistaken if some portion of it would not be traced to speculations in the Morris Canal and Banking Company—that vortex into which, so much capital had been drawn. It would be the duty of the committee to look into these matters, and to ascertain whether some portion of this money may not have been loaned to others, concerned with Mr. Swartwout, and may not yet be recovered. I care very little, sir, as to the mode in which the committee may be appointed, because I feel assured that however appointed it will make a searching investigation into this and every other defalcation, and that the committee will discharge its duty justly and honorably, wherever or whoever it may strike, whether the Department, the defaulters, or their associates in speculation. But, sir, I do not wish such a committee to be appointed in the dark—in a mode which shuns responsibility. I wish it appointed in the usual manner; that the Speaker may be held responsible, as he is to the House and to the country, for the appointment of a committee to which this important inquiry may be confided, one which will neither "whitewash" the Treasury Department, nor vindicate and justify the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout and the participation of his associates, if any such should be found.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, would respectfully ask the gentleman from New York, whether he expected the American people, when they found that the money which had been collected from them for the public service had been squandered by public agents and applied to their private uses, would be satisfied with vague declarations from him that the fraud had been committed by men of this or that political creed? Did he cherish the opinion that the Conservatives in that House were, he would not say to be deterred, but to be in the least affected in their course by the opinion of that gentleman, or of the public press, that the defaulters were Conservatives? For one, acting as he did with a small party, known at home as Democratic Republicans, whatever name they might bear here or elsewhere, he would say to that gentleman that they should be satisfied with nothing short of an exact, minute, elaborate inquiry, not into the political opinions of the delinquents—though others might drag in that consideration in order to serve a purpose—but into the extent and nature of the speculations which had taken place, and into the insufficiency of that Treasury machinery, which ought long ago to have detected the fraud; as well as into those legislative provisions which it was proper to adopt, in order to guard against a like occurrence in future. If the gentleman had the information—and he alone could possess it—that there were others connected with the Morris Canal and Banking Company, who participated in the speculation or in its fruits, all that would, by the inquiry, be brought fully to light. Let the House, let the country, have the facts. Nothing less would satisfy them.

The gentleman from New York had insinuated that it was a very remarkable thing that a Conservative should desire to be placed at the head of an investigating committee to look into these defalcations. Thus the gentleman attempted to parry the attack of one of his colleagues, [Mr. WISE,] by throwing out insinuations against another of his colleagues, who had not yet opened his mouth. The gentleman was assailed by a gentleman sitting on one side of the House, and, by way of a reply, he made an attack upon another gentleman in quite a different quarter. However, his colleague [Mr. GARLAND] was well able to take his own part. As one who should vote for the appointment of a committee by ballot, Mr. M. cared not of what political complexion the speculators might be; the American people disclaimed the idea that public trusts were only to be confided to those who were of one particular way of thinking in politics. He had said he should vote for a committee appointed by ballot. It was not needful that he should disclaim the belief that a proper committee would not be appointed by the presiding officer of the House, if he should be intrusted with that duty, for he entertained no such belief; but he would vouch for it, that the partisan press in opposition to the Administration would not fail, be the complexion of the committee what it might, to attribute its appointment to wrong motives. Let the committee, then, be appointed in such a way that no suspicions could be entertained with any color of reason. It was a great subject. The end in view was to protect the treasure of the country from dilapidation. It had been most shamefully squandered for nine years in succession, and yet the Treasury machinery had proved wholly inadequate to detect the robbery. This was not a vague assertion: it rested on the authority of the highest fiscal officer of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury himself. If such were the case, it called for the immediate interposition of the House. For one, he was desirous of a committee appointed by ballot, in order that the American people might feel assured that it would be such a committee, and conduct the inquiry in such a manner as should secure to them the efficient protection of this House. The gentleman had asked if the committee should be appointed by ballot, who would be responsible for it. A most extraordinary question! Who would be responsible? What! did the gentleman mean to throw out the imputation that any committee of this House reposed itself on the responsibility of the Speaker who appointed it?

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained. What he had asked was, who would be responsible for the appointment of the committee, if it was appointed in the dark?

Mr. MASON. Who would be responsible? The committee itself would be responsible, let who would appoint them.

[Here some gentleman, speaking across, said, let them be appointed viva voce.]

Yes, sir, (said Mr. M.) let them be appointed viva voce, if you will; I am ready for such a vote; but however appointed, I say the committee, when appointed, will be responsible for its own acts.

He had deemed it proper that a committee should be raised in such a manner as to protect the inquiry confided to them from all suspicion of a design to whitewash anybody. Let their report go to the American people stamped with the impress of a bona fide intention to redress a great public evil. He went for such a report as should bear the broad seal of truth on its front, and should be wholly freed from a partisan character.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would accept the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], as now modified, save so much of it as proposed that the committee be appointed by ballot.

Mr. WISE inquired whether the gentleman had a right to accept of the amendment with a reservation of any part of it? Must he not accept it as a whole?

The CHAIR said the gentleman had a perfect right to modify his own resolution by the addition to it of whatever words he pleased.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said the gentleman from New York had undertaken to answer arguments as his which he had never made.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained. He had been answering the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. WISE], who had talked about a stocked pack, and about a whitewashing committee, &c.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir, the gentleman's answer was to my colleague, but all the thunder of it fell on my poor head. And what has been my sin in this matter? I, it seems, am answerable for the defalcation of Swartwout, because he is a Conservative. Sir, I believe he was a Conservative, and the result was, that he conserved more than a million of the public money, and conserved himself to boot, and got off safe to London. Is that my fault?

The gentleman made another suggestion, by which he attempted to put me in an awkward position; he says it did not look well in me to want to be at the head of an investigating committee on the defalcation of a Conservative friend. Sir, I flatly deny the charge. I might appeal to gentlemen on this floor who know that when I offered the resolution which my colleague has adopted, I expressly disclaimed all wish or purpose to be on the committee. But how does the gentleman's doctrine apply to himself? Does he not know that, by the same rule of courtesy, he would himself be placed at the head of the committee? He moved it in the first instance. But he says he asked to be excused from serving on it. Well, sir, and are there no other gentlemen who could prefer the same request? I have had enough, Heaven knows, of the chairmanship of investigating committees. I want no more of it, I assure you. The gentleman wants to know how it is that I should seek to examine into the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, a political friend; yet the gentleman, after admitting that my resolution was more comprehensive than his own, accepted it as a modification. If I offered it with a view to cover up my friend's defalcation, how comes it that he accepted it who wants to expose him? His only objection to my proposition is, that it proposes a committee appointed by ballot; the rest he adopts as his own. Sir, was it I who first moved in this matter? Was it not the gentleman himself? Did not the President suggest the measure in his message? Did not the Secretary do the same thing in his report? And was it not, again I ask, the gentleman himself who commenced the affair? I might retort upon the gentleman by asking why he did not include Mr. Price's case, and whether he omitted it because that gentleman is a political friend of his?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I thought I had explained that matter already. The case of Mr. Price was not then heard of.

Mr. GARLAND. If the gentleman made that explanation, I did not hear it. But, sir, I here tell the gentleman from New York that denunciations of this kind will never drive me from my course in this House or elsewhere. In the discharge of my duty I am responsible to my Creator, to my country, and to my constituents; and I never have asked any man, and I never will, in what manner I shall discharge it.

But, sir, was there not some reason that I should have moved in this business. The gentleman from New York and his friends advocate one plan for managing the moneyed concerns of the country; I and my friends advocate another. The gentleman and his associates declare that this great defalcation of Swartwout is to be traced to the system we advocate. Was it to be expected that I should sit coldly by, and let any course be taken that he and his friends might choose to point out? Sir, this is not a solitary case. These defalcations have been multiplying with an awful rapidity. Scarce do our ears recover from the sound of one explosion, before another still louder bursts upon them. They commenced with little accounts of $30,000 and $40,000, and they have gone on till they have grown to upwards of a million at a blow. And all this, forsooth, is to be attributed to the State bank system; and yet we are not to ask a full investigation, for fear of being charged with a design to cover up the iniquities of our political friends! I ask any man to look at the resolution I offered, and see how it covers up the default? Are not the committee to examine everywhere? May they not examine the banks too? The powers, as I supposed, were full enough to cover the most ample investigation; but, if not, I here tell the gentleman from New York, that if he wants any further powers, let him put the resolution in his own words, and I will vote for it. I seek to screen nobody.

As to a committee by ballot, those who know my past history know that that is no new idea with me. In the Legislature of my own State, it was ever a favorite with me. Not that I distrust the Speaker. I know that he does ordinarily appoint committees; but while, on ordinary occasions, the House, by its acquiescence, may suffer him to exercise this power, yet, in great and momentous emergencies, it should appoint its own committees for itself. Sir, whose committee is this to be? The Speaker's? or the House's committee? The argument of the gentleman comes to just this: the House can trust the Speaker, but it can't trust itself. That's it, sir. If we appoint by ballot, we act "in the dark;" there is no responsibility. Sir, it is a reflection on the character of this House. But is not this a question on which the House should assume the responsibility, and not cast it on the Speaker? If he appoints the committee, and their report bears hard on one party, we shall immediately hear some gentleman get up and talk about a stocked pack; and, if it bears hard on the other side, we shall hear the same complaints and insinuations from that quarter; party feeling will have its influence, and the appointment of the committee is sure to dissatisfy somebody. I propose that the House take its own responsibility, and then let the report bear on whom it may. There can be no complaints of a "stocked pack." But no, sir; this won't do. The House cannot trust itself; there will be no responsibility. Sir, I tell the gentleman I am ready for a viva voce vote. I am prepared to tell the gentleman from New York, and every other gentleman, who they are I vote for. I will give the gentleman a copy of my ticket, and he may put it in the papers, if he will. And if the gentleman is still haunted with the idea that I am seeking the chair of the committee, I will here make a bargain with him; and we will both agree to stay off the committee altogether. There are others fitter for the place than either of us. Let the House take the vote in any form; I, for one, request not to be put on the committee. Have I asked any gentleman to vote for me? If I have, let them say so. Besides, if the committee is chosen by ballot, you, Mr. Speaker, will not appoint the chairman of it, so the usual obligation of courtesy would not put me at the head of it; the chairman would be appointed by the House, or chosen by the committee itself. How could I know that I should be made chairman? The gentleman's charge falls to the ground. No, sir, I am actuated, I trust, by higher motives than the poor, pitiful, contemptible hope of being placed in the chair of a committee. I tell the gentleman from New York that, not for the honor of his good opinion, nor for the sake of avoiding his bad opinion, would I accept such a distinction. I don't want such another task; once is quite enough. But I also say that if, notwithstanding my request to the contrary, I shall be placed on that committee, I shall endeavor to do my duty faithfully and fearlessly. But I hope to remain here on the floor, where I am ready to meet the gentleman from New York on his fine financial scheme of keeping the public money in the hands of individuals. On that plan I mean to be heard in this House.

Sir, it is due to the little party of which I am a member, that a full and fair investigation be had, to see whether the State-banks are accountable for this money. If he will prove that they are, I will abandon the State bank scheme to-morrow morning. The gentleman's grand political rule of policy in the matter is this: if an individual keeps the public money for a week, he will rob the nation; but if he keeps it for a month or a year, he will not touch a cent of it. That is not my creed. Why, sir, in this case of Swartwout, the money was all plundered before ever it reached the banks. I here ask the gentleman from New York; in his place, do the banks owe to the Government, at this moment, one single cent of this money? Have they not paid every dollar that was intrusted to them? Yet they are to be held responsible; the default is chargeable on the State-bank system, and not on the Sub-Treasury!

Mr. CUSHING said that the aspect of the question before the House was materially changed since the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] came forward to move an inquiry into the peculations of the collector of New York. That motion he (Mr. C.) regarded as an event, an epoch in the history of the times. It stood strikingly in contrast with what occurred only two years ago. At that time the President of the United States undertook to certify to the integrity of the departments and officers of the Government. The Administration claimed to be spotless; it seemed to challenge scrutiny of its acts; it held itself up as immaculate; as if there was no taint of its intact purity, no blot on the whiteness of its ermine. Nay, when committees of investigation were appointed by the House, the Administration assumed the lofty tone of indignant innocence, and repelled with all the force of its power the accusation then made by the gentleman from Virginia. The same contrast was yet more glaring, when it was considered that the Administration of his colleague [Mr. ADAMS] had been assailed with every species of imputation by those now in power, and the most trivial acts of that period were dealt with as the greatest political enormities. This Administration had come in over the ruins of that; upon the profession, loud and confident, of the high-spirited purity of its purposes and spirit. What a spectacle was now presented, when the particular organ of the Administration himself [Mr. CAMBRELENG] came to the House to ask for a committee to investigate facts of extraordinary official corruption happening under that Administration. Its friends it would seem, were driven, by the irresistible impulse of circumstances, no longer to resist investigation. They could not withstand the astounding exposures which had risen up in judgment against them. Accordingly they put on the attitude of fairness, and proposed inquiry. But what inquiry? It was of secondary consequence what were the defaults of individuals. There was nothing to examine in the specific case of Swartwout. All the facts were proved and established. There they were, authenticated upon the official papers of the Treasury! All that remained of that case was trivial in itself, and little worthy of the special agency of a select committee of the House. It was material to inquire what other defaulters there were, not yet detected, that the Treasury might be saved from further losses. It was material to look into the dishonor which such acts brought on the country. And it was material to see whether the defalcations, of which this one was but a specimen, and which reflected so much discredit on the country, did not devolve indelible disgrace upon the Administration under which they happened. These were the pinching points in the relations of a case of official enormity unheard of in the annals of the nation.

But did the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] himself propose investigation of these true objects of such investigations? Not at all. But now, since such further inquiry had been proposed to the friends of the Administration, a change had come over the spirit of their dream. They begin to shrink from the consequences of the ascertained facts, and of a due inquiry into all the relations of those facts. But here the facts are, gross as a mountain, open, palpable. And "what trick, what device, what starting hole is there to escape from this open and apparent shame?" The House now begins to see what this device is. It is clear what the train of thought is, passing through the mind of the gentleman from New York. It has been hinted before. Swartwout, we are told, is a Conservative, and opposed to the Administration; and thus gentlemen seek to shift from their shoulders the present load of ignominy. The answer is obvious. Whether he be a Conservative or not, his default happened by the fault of the Administration, its gross neglect to make due examination, its want of ordinary care, if nothing worse, by reason of which these peculations had run through a space of years, and had swollen from hundreds to hundreds of thousands. It mattered not, therefore, what party Swartwout belonged to, Whig or Tory, Conservative or Destructive; still, for his peculation the Administration was responsible before God and man. But was it not amusing enough to hear the gentleman from New York throwing off this Swartwout case upon the Opposition? Was it not notorious that that individual was one of the special pets of Andrew Jackson—appointed as his particular friend—appointed as a memorial of their ancient association in Burr's conspiracy—appointed because of his distinguished services as an electioneering partisan, actively instrumental in behalf of the late President? And had not his defalcations gone on for seven or eight years before Swartwout wavered in his allegiance to the powers that be? Under these circumstances, it was absurd—it was more, it was superlatively ridiculous—to say that the Whigs, the wicked Whigs, the cunning Whigs, were laboring to screen one of themselves. No such thing. This device will not avail the Administration. Vainly will they say, with Lady Macbeth, "Out, damned spot!" It will not out. They are steeped in guilt to the very elbows. There is not water enough in the deep sea to wash them clean of the indelible proofs of their corruption.

And again: Is Swartwout the only peculator before the House? To pass over the lesser names of Boyd and the rest, is there not William M. Price, the crack orator of Tammany Hall, the peculiar party adviser of Mr. Van Buren in the city of New York, the special friend there of the gentleman himself, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] the man to bring up to the polls the thousand of the faithful of New York in solid columns in his behalf? Do these artful Whigs desire to screen him? They cannot screen Swartwout without screening Price. They are par nobile fratrum—Arcades ambo. They have risen together, and fallen together, and together they are linked for good and for evil. But the gentleman from New York seems to think that the appointment of a committee, by ballot, is to screen the guilty. Was there ever anything more absurd? How to screen the guilty? Why, such a mode of appointment is working in the dark, forsooth. In the dark! What? Here, in the face of Heaven, and of this bright sun, and these assembled crowds of spectators gazing upon us, is a vote here an act performed in the dark? Preposterous! Whether by ballot or viva voce, (and Mr. C. said he was indifferent which,) such a mode of appointment was not in the dark. An appointment by the Speaker, in his private apartment, alone, with no eye on him but God's, that, and that alone, was an appointment in the dark. But again: Early in the session, when this defalcation was first discussed, here or elsewhere, we heard something of a "President's committee." The Richmond Enquirer told us there was to be a "President's committee." This is what the country does not want. It wants no President's committee, but a people's committee; and such a committee the House means to have; one to do its duty, not to the President, but to the country. Strike where it may, such a committee there ought to be; one to probe corruption to the very bottom; to penetrate the very vitals of guilt; to denounce punishment on the wrongdoer, whoever he be, high or low, friend or foe, and wherever a blow may be advantageously struck. It can be done. It will be done. Such a committee must do its duty to the nation, whose eyes would be upon it with sleepless jealousy. Its members will have to take heed to themselves, and explore all the crooked ways of corruption, and unearth the guilty, without fear, favor, or affection. He that flinches in the hour of trial will be lashed into the path of duty by the whips of general indignation, and, if he fails, will become a mark for the finger of scorn to the end of time. Therefore it is that there should be a choice of the committee by the House; not (said Mr. C.) that I mean any imputation on the integrity of the Speaker, but because the influences of party should be excluded from the question, and ample regard be had to the appointment of a committee of investigation, in the most solemn form recognized by the House, with the stamp of its immediate power and authority upon it, that it may so far as possible have the confidence of the country, and its report go forth to the world as the voice of the people's House of Representatives.

Mr. PICKENS inquired of the Chair whether it was a rule of the House, as lately established, that the election viva voce applied to committees of the House.

The CHAIR replied in the negative. It applied to officers of the House alone.

Mr. PICKENS. I am in favor of the most unlimited and unrestricted investigation the case demands. My only objection is to a change in the mode of choosing committees. It is the established practice of the House for the Chair to appoint them. The reason of this, I suppose, has been to enable the House to act with energy and decision. It is impossible, in practice, to bring so numerous a body to act, otherwise, with any decision. Especially is this the case in the short session. Yet, although I am opposed to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, on principles of expediency and policy, and though I believe the difficulty of the inquiry to be so great that it cannot be gotten through with this session, yet I will vote for the resolution, because gentlemen who are clamorous for an investigation, wish the resolution to pass in that form. I will give them all they ask. Let them probe corruption to the very bottom. I will not shield the guilty. I will hold up defaulters to the sun in the heavens, and let the flies blow on them, and let the world gaze at the corruption that covers them.

The gentlemen shall have justice done, so far as my vote can go.

I should not now trouble the House had I not been referred to by several gentlemen who have been up. What! do gentlemen suppose that, because I choose to support an Administration because it supports the principles of the Constitution, my mouth is to be shut when corruption is to be exposed? If they do, they have greatly mistaken me. Neither the smiles of party favor, nor the pitiful denunciations of party malignity, shall ever deter me from treading the path of honor and virtue. I do believe that there has existed most shameful corruption in the country. Take your committee, and go and search it out, and purge the country from the contamination.

But when you attribute this defalcation and that defalcation to this or that peculiar system of managing the public finances, I enter my protest against all such deductions. As well might you attempt to make God responsible for sin because he has breathed life into human beings. No, sir; whatever gentlemen may charge upon the Sub-Treasury scheme, I believe that much of this robbery is chargeable on the legislation of this body. You have thrown millions upon millions into the keeping of the Treasury, and human nature is not always able to withstand the force of temptation. I did not vote for these measures. In 1835 the House voted to place $3,000,000, in one gross sum, in the hands of the Executive, to be disposed of, at his discretion, in the public service, without specifying a single object to which it should be applied. Thank God, no man can say that I sustained such proceedings. The gentleman has quoted Shakespeare. I will say to him, "Thou canst not say I did it." I will not screen any man from investigation. I go for the strictest responsibility of every officer of Government to this House. These principles have always governed me; and no temptation shall seduce me to depart from them. Let no one suppose I shall abandon them for party considerations. I scorn it. I will express my sentiments here with the most perfect freedom. No party ties shall bind me down on questions of corruption. Take your committee. You shall have my vote. Take it. But still I believe the thing will prove a failure. I desire that the examination be full and prompt. I should think that a committee, if appointed by the Chair, ought to have upon it a majority of those who are heartily in favor of the inquiry. But gentlemen desire another mode of raising the committee, and they shall have it. As to the poor, miserable party tactics about whether the defaulter has been a Whig, or a Conservative, or a friend of the Administration, it is to me not a matter of the slightest interest. I would not turn on my heel to save the President himself, if he is justly chargeable. Again, I say, take my vote.

Mr. WISE next rose and said he was glad he had got the floor at last. He wanted it, that he might reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York over the way, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] but first he would say a few words in answer to what had just fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question now is only whether this investigation shall be made bona fide. An investigation is proposed; the Administration itself proposes it; and if you will give them only such a sort of investigation as they seek, verily they will go for it. But the question now is, and it is emphatically the question, whether the investigating committee shall be appointed by Mr. Speaker, or by this House; whether it shall be appointed here by ballot, or in the secrecy of the Speaker's chamber. And what is the rule? Does its spirit and letter contemplate that committees shall be appointed by the Chair alone? No; it says, indeed, that they shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless the House determine otherwise, "in which case they shall be appointed by ballot." The rule obviously contemplates and provides for the occurrence of cases in which there will be a necessity that the House take the matter into their own hands. Sir, I will put a case: supposing there should arise a time in this country, when we have a corrupt Executive in the White House, and a gentleman presiding over this House to which orders from such Executive are law. We may suppose such a case, I presume, and suppose further, that through the thousands of post offices and the hundreds of land offices the Executive has exerted a powerful patronage, and given office to his partisans who are wastefully and shamelessly squandering and plundering the public money, and that, when inquiry is moved into these abuses, the Executive has a tool there, (pointing to the Chair,) there may still perhaps be honest men enough on this floor to be disposed to probe the corruption of the Government.

Mr. PICKENS here inquired whether the gentleman intended to allude to him.

Mr. WISE. Not at all; the supposed case had no reference to the gentleman from South Carolina; the case referred to a state of things when the Administration had its devoted friend in the chair of this House. Mr. Speaker, is not such a case supposable? Would it be so very strange a thing in these times? Is it not at least a possible case? Sir, I will not go back to the committees of 1836 and 1837, nor remind you and this House in what manner you appointed them. There is now a minority of this House in opposition to the Administration; but at the same time, there is a majority opposed to your fine Administration scheme of a Sub-Treasury, and who are for probing the corruptions which have grown up under a system which, though thrice rejected, the President is determined to force on the country. Is the Speaker with that majority? And if not, what sort of probing shall we have from a committee of his naming?

Again: My friend from South Carolina tells us, in tone and spirit of past time, that you will not catch him screening plunderers; no, sir, not fly-blowing can harden him to their distress. Well, sir, this is the tone I was wont to hear echoing through this Hall when the gentleman stood side by side with me, and went heart and hand for a bona fide investigation of abuses. Yet the honorable gentleman will allow me to say that he seems to grant the investigation somewhat grudgingly. He says, "take your committee!" "take my vote," "take it," if you will have it—"take it." Sir, I should rather have expected him to ask that vote from others, than thus to grant it as if extorted. "Take it," is language I should rather have expected from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] But, sir, all this is easily explained. It all arises from the peculiar position my friend occupies. He denounces the Whigs as a pitiful, disappointed faction; yet, permit me to say, he stands with those who seem to be very much like a disappointed faction themselves. I am glad, however, that the gentleman and his friends are at least not with the Administration. He cares not a farthing on what party the blow shall fall; he would not turn on his heel to save the President. Indeed! Has a change come over the spirit of his dream? Does he begin to distrust the sincerity of that party for whose embrace he left his old friends? I expected it would be so. And I congratulate my friend and the country that it is so.

Again: My friend from South Carolina says, and says truly, that the defalcations are not to be attributed to this system or to that. No, sir, it is neither to a Bank of the United States, nor to the State banks, nor to the Sub-Treasury, that you are to attribute these enormous corruptions. No. Have what system you may, if you put its administration into the hands of wicked and incompetent rulers, the plan must fail of doing any good. That has been proved by the course of this Administration. The defalcation of Swartwout commenced under the United States Bank system; it went on under the system of pet banks; and it reached its consummation under the Sub-Treasury system, which is now in full operation "notwithstanding any lamentations, here or elsewhere." Is there, then, no remedy? Yes, there is one, and only one: the remedy is a GENERAL TURN OUT: that, and that alone, is our only hope of salvation.

Again: My friend and myself differ materially in another point. He blames the appropriations of Congress for this corruption. To that there is an answer, pat and plain. Were these moneys, which Swartwout stole, ever in the Treasury? Never. Then they were not appropriated out of the Treasury. No, sir. Appropriations by this House had nothing to do with it. They were custom-house bonds and other securities, stolen in transitu, before they ever got into the Treasury. So far from being appropriated, they were never even deposited. How, then, can my honorable friend say that our appropriations are to blame for the theft?

But I come now, Mr. Speaker, to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] I asked him before, why he did not include the case of Price in his motion for inquiry; and he now tells me, in reply, that it would have been wonderful if he had, because the departure of Mr. Price was not then heard of. Indeed, sir! Mr. Price embarked on the 6th; the news immediately reached the Treasury by his letter; and the gentleman's resolution was offered on the 10th.

Mr. CAMBRELENG here explained. The case of Swartwout had been mentioned in the President's message. The moment it was announced, he had offered his resolution. Price's letter was published in the newspapers.

Mr. WISE. I refer the gentleman to the Journal. There is the entry. His resolution was moved on the 10th.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. Was it not on the 8th Mr. WISE. No, sir; it was on the 10th.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I thought it had been earlier.

Mr. WISE. No, sir, no earlier. William Price, the co-ordinator of the gentleman from New York, who preceded him at Tammany—

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I refer the gentleman to his colleague who sits near me, [Mr. MERCER,] whether I did not suggest to him to include the case of Price.

Mr. WISE. Oh ho! You did!—ah!—well! Then the gentleman did know of Price's case, else how could he have suggested to my colleague to include it?

Mr. MERCER said it was very true that the honorable gentleman had made to him such a suggestion. Intending himself to offer a resolution in almost the same words with that which had subsequently been offered by his honorable colleague on the other side, [Mr. GARLAND,] Mr. M. had submitted it to the gentleman from New York, who said he was willing to accept all of it but the clause providing for the appointment of the investigating committee by ballot.

Mr. WISE. Well, sir. The matter stands precisely in statu quo. The gentleman did know of Price's defalcation, though he has just said, for the second time, that he did not. There is no escaping. The gentleman knew it, but did not include it in his resolution. Why? Mr. Price is a good, genuine, full-blooded Locofoco. Swartwout was a Conservative. Swartwout's case must be examined—nothing said about Price's. Sir, Mr. Price followed the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] upon the hustings at Tammany, and harangued the mob there assembled to convince them that the Sub-Treasury was the best scheme in the world for keeping the public money, in which I doubt not he was very sincere. Sir, they were co-ordinators, co-plotters; but, as God would have it, both of them—doubling teams as they did—both of them were defeated—ay, sir, put to the rout.

But, sir, the honorable gentleman is very indignant about this charge of whitewashing; and, to prove that the committee was not to be a whitewashing committee, he reminds me that he desired not to be put upon it. Sir, I know he did not desire to be put on that committee. No, sir; the Administration has other uses for that gentleman. He is worked sufficiently by being put at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means. But the gentleman well knew that, though he was not to be at the head of the whitewashing, there were other gentlemen strong in spirit and ardent in zeal who stood ready to serve the party in any way. I did say, and I here repeat, that, judging of the future from the past, if this committee of inquiry shall be appointed by that Speaker, (pointing to the Chair,) it will be a WHITEWASHING COMMITTEE.

My colleague [Mr. MASON] wants the committee appointed by ballot, in order to avoid imputations on the Speaker; I want it appointed by ballot, to avoid the Speaker himself. To avoid imputations! After the experience I have had, my colleague would not talk in such holiday terms about avoiding imputations on the impartiality of the CHAIR. We had two investigating committees in 1837-'38. I was at the head of one, and my colleague, who sits on this side of the House, [Mr. GARLAND,] was at the head of the other. Well, sir, and how were they constituted? As I said lately, the committee was size-tres. Every throw of the dice was still size-tres. Sir, not only had I to play with a stocked pack, but the dice were loaded. Sir, can the people play against this Administration with false cards and false dice? No, sir. If I play again, it must be with gentlemen, and at an honorable game. Further: if I catch a rogue cheating me of my money, I will punish him; and never will I play with that man again. The gentleman from New York goes for the "ordinary course." Ay, for the ordinary course. And so does the Secretary of the Treasury, who, through his agent here, the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. CUSHMAN,] told the House that he was very willing for an investigation provided the committee was appointed in the usual mode.

Mr. CUSHMAN rose to explain amidst cries of "No!" "No!" He had stated that, in regard to the mode of appointing the committee, the Secretary had made no allusion at all.

Mr. WISE. Oh, no, sir; none at all. But his friend, the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire (without, of course, the least conference or understanding with the Secretary) is willing an investigation should take place, provided the committee is appointed in the usual mode. Well, sir, and what is the "usual mode?" I may say, the universal mode? Why, sir, it is size-tres.

The gentleman from New York said, or insinuated, that the Conservatives here wished to whitewash their friend, Mr. Swartwout. Why, sir, who is Samuel Swartwout? Who appointed him? Sir, it was the Greatest and Best. I would inquire of the honorable gentleman whether this was his certificate of recommendation, (pointing to a book in his hand.) There is a book in the Library which bears the title of "Burr's Trial," and the man who appointed Mr. Swartwout collector of New York was a witness on that trial, and knew all the facts as well if not better, than any other man. Perhaps he knew, too, that Aaron Burr gave Samuel Swartwout a letter of introduction to General Wilkinson. I will read it:

"PHILADELPHIA, July 25, 1806.

"DEAR SIR: Mr. Swartwout, the brother of Colonel S., of New York, being on his way down the Mississippi, and presuming that he may pass you at some post on the river, has requested of me a letter of introduction, which I gave with pleasure, as he is a most amiable young man, and highly respectable from his character and connections. I pray you to afford him any friendly offices which his situation may require, and beg you to pardon the trouble which this may give you.

"With entire respect, your friend and obedient servant,
A. BURR.

"His Excellency General WILKINSON."

Ay, sir, the same Swartwout, that "amiable young man," was the bearer in the same envelope of all of Burr's treasonable plots. Swartwout was saved from prosecution himself only by coming out in a manly manner as a witness against the conspirators. This man—thus tainted—thus marked with the plague spot of treason—this Levi the son of Alpheus, was appointed to sit at the receipt of customs in the great commercial metropolis; and the party approved it. Yet they themselves now come forward and tell us that this traitor to his country commenced his work of spoliation from the very commencement of his term of office, and continued it for several years, and never ceased till his term expired; and yet the Government never suspected him! And now we are to be told that he was "a Conservative!"

Sir, I will put to the gentleman and to the House a case in simple equations—in the rule of three: If Samuel Swartwout, who was a Conservative, and so but half a genuine Locofoco, stole a million and a quarter, how much would he have stolen had he been full-blooded? I suppose at least two millions and a half. It seems, however, that he got all the money before he turned Conservative. Sir, even allowing he had any Whig blood in his veins, can the gentleman ascertain whether it was this or the other sort of blood that prompted him to these depredations? Certainly the Locofoco predominated in him. Sir, to be serious, has it come to this? Are we brought so low, that when public robbers and plunderers are detected and brought up for punishment, we are to be told: "Oh, you should not complain of this, or seek to expose him, because he is one of your party! We permit our people to pick and steal, but you should not complain when one of your side gets a little spice of the good things too." Would it have ever been supposed that a representative of the people in this House, and one especially bound, from the place he occupies, to devise ways and means to save the public purse, would bring such an insulting argument before us? Is it intended to hold up a bribe to the Swiss? a reward to those who will become parasites and panders to the men in power? Can that be the meaning of such a course? He tells us that Swartwout is to be whitewashed by a committee appointed "in the dark." Sir, how many windows are there in this Hall? There, sir, over head, is a magnificent dome, and the sky-light at its top sheds a vertical light upon us—the light of day—of this day—and it is the 8th of January remember, [the drums were heard at the moment.] And we are to be told, in the full sunlight of heaven, that what we do here is done "in the dark!" What does the gentleman mean? Does he mean that if we vote by ballot, the President will not know how each man professing to be a friend of the party voted? Is that what he means? If it is, (and it is what he means,) I tell him that, in a case like this, "darkness," in his sense of the term, suits the interests of the people better than light. If to vote for this searching committee à la voce, or leave it to be nominated by the Chair, will insure the purposes of those in power, then better were it that we be descended into the tomb prepared beneath this Capitol for the ashes of the Father of his Country. Ay, sir, better that we voted in a vault, than be called to stand and vote in front of the spears of power. If the people need the panoply of the ballot-box, give them the ballot-box.

Dry Docks—Mr. Paynter, Mr. Pickens, etc.

HO. OF REPS.

The gentleman asks, what has become of the millions which have been stolen? What has Swartwout done with the money? knowing (as he might know) that it was given for speculation to the Morris Canal and Banking Company. Now, sir, it so happens that I, too, know something about that Morris Canal Company, as well as the honorable gentleman. In 1837, I received a letter stating that the public money had been abstracted from the Girard Bank and other banks, to be employed in purposes of speculation; and that the Josephs, of New York, and Mr. Lewis, were privy to the facts. I thereupon issued summonses calling Lewis and the Josephs to the city of Washington, to testify before a committee. But when Lewis came before us, not one of the various questions which I put to him to elicit the truth of the case, would that famous and pure size-tres committee suffer to be put! And, after this, would you suppose that any friend of the Administration would rise here and dare to talk to me about this Morris Canal and Banking Company? When I wrote to the Josephs, I got, in reply, one of the most pitiable letters you ever saw, stating that he had some bodily ailment which would prevent him from coming on. So much for the gentleman's "Morris Canal and Banking Company."

But I ask you, sir, and I ask the country, and I ask the gentleman himself, what were the officers of this Government doing while these abductions of the public treasure, for purposes of private speculation, were going on? [Here Mr. Wise sunk his voice so low as to be totally inaudible to the reporter.] Sir, the answer will be found in the celebrated letter of Mr. Senator Hendricks to the Secretary, about the case of Spencer—"Better let it alone!"

And now, sir, we are told that the light-houses, the very eyes of commerce, are to be put out, and river and harbor improvements are to stop, by reason of these defalcations of the Administration's favorites; while thousands upon thousands are to go to buy votes, and to retain power most ignominiously got, and which you have dishonored.

Mr. BOON said, after the display of eloquence which had just been witnessed by all present, he had risen to address the House under some embarrassment. But, inasmuch as what he had to say was not intended for those in the galleries of the House, or for the House itself, he presumed it would be permitted to pass for what it might be worth to those for whose ear it was intended. I (said Mr. B.) wish to speak a few words for Buncombe. I intend my remarks for my constituents, if what I say should chance to reach them; in order to let them know why it is that I will not vote to appoint a committee of the House by ballot—by the members of the House. I am opposed to the proposition, because it would be a total departure, not only from the usual mode of appointing committees of this House, but it would also be a departure from the universal practice which has prevailed in the House of Representatives from its first organization to the present time. And, furthermore, it would be, as had been very truly remarked by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] a dark transaction, and avoiding altogether any individual responsibility to the country, in the appointment of important committees, thus to be raised in the dark, by ballot. I again repeat the fact, that the appointment of a committee of this House by ballot would be a dark transaction; for it would be utterly impossible for the country to know how, or for whom, any member of the House voted. If the long-established practice in the appointment of committees of this House is to be departed from in this particular case, let it be by a visa voce vote, in order that responsibility to the country may attach where of right it should do.

Mr. B. was in favor of the freest and fullest investigations into frauds and defalcations of public officers of every description, and he was also in favor of the appointment of committees for any and for all purposes by the Speaker of the House, believing that a fairer committee for all parties would be obtained by appointment made by the presiding officer of the House than by the House itself. Should the committee be appointed by the Speaker of the House, he would, no doubt, appoint some Conservatives, some Whigs, and some Administration men. This (Mr. B. said) would be right. But should the committee be appointed by the House by ballot, it would most likely be composed of members of one party only. This would not be right or proper. But it is both right and proper that there should be a majority of Administration men on all committees. It was (he said) the parliamentary usage to appoint, on all committees, a majority of members composing such committees who were known to be friendly to the Administration.

Mr. B. said some gentlemen seem to think that it is no matter whether a public defaulter be a Whig, or a Conservative, or an Administration man. Sir, I think differently from gentlemen entertaining these views. It has been the constant policy of the Opposition, by every possible means, to make the people at a distance from this city believe that there was not in the whole country a Government officer or a public defaulter that was not an Administration man, and that all the frauds upon the public Treasury have been committed by friends of the late and present Chief Magistrates. This (said Mr. B.) is untrue; and it was but right that the truth should go forth to the people, and the country should know whether the Whigs, or the Conservatives, or the Democrats, had committed the greatest public frauds, or stolen most from the public Treasury. This was a very important fact to be known and properly understood by the American people. If, at any time, an office-holder of the Opposition was removed from office for any cause whatever, the yelp of "proscription for opinion's sake" was immediately raised by the Federal press throughout the country; and if certain of the late public defaulters had been earlier detected in their peculations upon the Treasury, and removed from office, the country would have heard the old cry of "proscription for opinion's sake."

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] propounded to the Chair a question of arithmetic, to be answered by the rule of three, and which was: "If a Conservative office-holder had, in a given period, stolen from the public Treasury a million and a quarter of dollars, how much would a full-blooded Locofoco have stolen in the same length of time?" Now (said Mr. B.) I propose that the question be put in this way: "If a Conservative office-holder has, in a given period of time, stolen from the public Treasury a million and a quarter of dollars, how much more would a full-blooded, wiggly-tail Whig have stolen in the same length of time?"

Mr. BOND obtained the floor, and, having proceeded for some time, moved an adjournment. And thereupon the House adjourned.

DRY-DOCKS.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE.

January 10, 1839.

The House having resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BANKS, of Virginia, in the chair) on certain bills reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and which had been made the special order for this day, the committee took up for consideration the bill for extending and improving the Navy Yard at Brooklyn, New York, and for constructing a Dry Dock at the same.

A motion was made by Mr. PAYNTER to amend the bill by inserting a new section appropriating $100,000 for the construction of a dry-dock at the navy-yard in Philadelphia.

Mr. PAYNTER said that the time had arrived when every navy-yard of any magnitude in our country ought to have a dry-dock. In the year 1835, one of the largest, and probably best, ships in our navy was launched from the navy-yard in Philadelphia. That ship had been taken to Gosport to be finished. What would have been the consequence if this were to be the case in time of war? The ship would be captured before she got out of the capes. This was a bad condition to be in. He hoped his amendment would prevail. He believed that a dry-dock could not be built under one or two years, and he asked this appropriation for the purpose of commencing upon it.

Mr. PICKENS said he had risen simply to remark that the bill, as it came from the Committee on Naval Affairs, was such as could receive his support most cordially. It provided for the erection of a dry-dock near the city of New York—a measure which was admitted in all quarters to be absolutely essential for our ships; and it was a remarkable fact that a work of this kind would more than pay back the cost of its construction in a very few years, in the preservation and repair of our vessels. But if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PAYNTER] persisted in his effort to append this new appropriation for another object, other gentlemen in different parts of the House would offer their amendments, and would thus create an interest in the House in favor of local appropriations which would be the means of defeating the bill. If the bill was to be loaded down with such amendments, it could not receive his (Mr. P.'s) sanction. This was a branch of that system which had been introduced here, and which had given birth to unsound legislation by combining local interests on particular measures, and thus uniting a majority which would pass a bill amounting to a million of dollars; when, probably, not a single isolated measure contained in it could, of itself, and on its own merits, have received the vote of a majority. He protested against this system, and hoped the amendment would not prevail. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania bring in a bill at the next session of Congress to gain his object; let it stand on its own separate merits. But let it not interfere with the object of the present bill. Mr. P. believed that a dry-dock was absolutely required at New York—more so, probably, than in any other part of the country.

Mr. INGHAM said, that although the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PAYNTER,] who offered this amendment, was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, yet he had not offered the amendment to the consideration of the committee. He appealed to the gentleman to withdraw it, and not to embarrass a bill which provided for the erection of a dry-dock in a place where it was needed, and which had from time to time received the approbation of the Department. The site at Philadelphia had never been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Dry Docks—Mr. Naylor, Mr. Ingham, etc.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. NAYLOR. Did I understand the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. INGHAM] to say that the site of the navy-yard at Philadelphia had never been examined with a view to the establishment of a dry-dock there? There was a very elaborate report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs at the last session of Congress in favor of such an establishment there?

Mr. INGHAM admitted it. What he intended to say was, that the site had never been examined by any of the proper officers of the Department, with a view to establish a dry-dock there, and that it had never been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. NAYLOR. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that the site of Philadelphia is strongly recommended by the necessities of the case. And I will point to a fact which, of itself, speaks volumes. One of the finest ships ever built here, or probably in the world—the ship of the line Pennsylvania—was taken from Philadelphia to Norfolk for the purpose of being there coppered and finished. And why? Because we had not the materials and the skill? No! But because there was no dry-dock at Philadelphia. The finest ships that have been built in the country—the President, the Franklin, the North Carolina, the Guerriere, the Pennsylvania—every one of them has been taken from that port. We have from time to time been building the best and the finest ships, by the best mechanics in the country, and yet they are taken from Philadelphia to be finished. If such be the fact, why not have a dry-dock? Is it not needed? It strikes me that Philadelphia and New York are both places where dry-docks are required more than anywhere else. In Philadelphia there is a great mercantile community. Sailors are raised there, and if you will extend to them the same encouragement that they find in the merchant service, there would be a sufficient number to man your whole Navy. You have there skillful and enterprising mechanics, able to build your best ships, and who do build them. You have all the materials for building, and all the means of equipping, supplying, and manning them; and, in addition to this, you have good sound fresh water, which is not injurious to the bottoms of the ships. I appeal to the candor of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] whether these facts do not show a strong necessity for a dry-dock at Philadelphia. We build as many vessels, and we build them as well, as the people of any other port in the Union. Our country is proud of them, and yet we cannot have the satisfaction of completing them because we have no dry-dock. In time of war, Philadelphia is beyond the reach of an enemy, and yet, by the aid of steam-vessels, you can take a ship from the capes of the Delaware to the city in twelve or fifteen hours, and place her beyond the thunders of an enemy. The distance of Philadelphia from the ocean is, therefore, a recommendation in its favor, instead of being an objection. Under all these circumstances, I ask if this is not a reasonable amendment? Is there not as much necessity for a dry-dock in Philadelphia as in New York?

Philadelphia is a great building station, and is one of the oldest and most celebrated in the country. A navy can be there built, supplied, equipped, manned, and fitted out for all the purposes of war or peace, at least as speedily and as well as in any other place in the country, and at a much more economical rate. These are advantages which every naval station should have; and no naval station can be complete without them. Philadelphia possesses them all in an eminent degree. In adopting this amendment, therefore, and establishing a dry-dock there, you give to her and her mechanics the opportunity to put forth all their genius and skill to the increase and improvement of our navy, and to the elevation of our naval character. Why should it not, therefore, be sustained? You have established a navy-yard there at a great cost to the Government; why not complete it? And it cannot be completed until you construct in it a dry-dock. I hope the amendment may prevail.

Mr. MALLORY said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] seemed to mistake the main object of a dry-dock. It was not so much to finish vessels which were built, as to repair them. One great objection to Philadelphia was the ice in the winter season. In the next place, there was not a sufficient draught of water for a vessel of war, with all her armament and stores, to go there. Now, in New York there was the requisite draught of water, and also in other places. When the North Carolina was carried round to Boston, there was not a dry-dock in the United States. She was carried there simply because it was safer than any where else. The great object of a dry-dock was, that when a ship of war, with her crew, armament, and munitions aboard, needed overhauling in her bottom, she could be carried into any one of these docks and repaired without moving anything. The dry-dock at Boston had saved to the country more money than the cost of its construction. He had no hostility to Philadelphia, but he did not regard it as a proper place for a dry-dock. If a bill were brought forward in a proper shape, probably his opposition to it might cease. But, at present, he saw no reason to favor the project.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had almost made up his mind, after the course which the present, or, he should more properly say, the late Administration had pursued towards the South on the subject of navy-yards, never to vote for another appropriation for a northern navy-yard, even if the alternative presented to him should be the rotting of the whole navy. He intended, however, to vote for this appropriation for a dry-dock at New York. There were two or three line-of-battle-ships now in that port which were absolutely rotting for want of it; and, though he could not, under such circumstances, withhold his assent to the appropriation, yet he confessed he yielded it most reluctantly. And when he made this declaration, he trusted that his course in this House, and more especially in reference to the section of country from which he came, would exempt him from the imputation of being influenced by any unworthy spirit of jealousy; or by any desire to enter into the miserable scramble for the public money or the public offices. This was almost the only branch of the public service in which the South could receive any appropriations. Deeply solicitous as the whole South is for the success of our great enterprise—the Charleston and Cincinnati railroad—we do not ask, and cannot even receive, an appropriation from this Government. Look at the situation of your southern coast. There is not a place from Norfolk to the Gulf of Mexico, where even a long-boat can be repaired. And, although, three years since, I succeeded in extorting from the House, by rallying southern and western gentlemen, and by putting them upon their metal, an appropriation for the naval establishment at Pensacola, yet none of that money has been laid out. It was grudgingly given, and has not yet been expended. Under these circumstances, I shall vote in favor of this appropriation; but I will not vote for it if it is connected with any rider whatsoever.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that as this was the first appropriation during the present session for a new object, it might be proper to say a word in relation to it. Properly speaking, however, this was not a new appropriation. It was merely re-appropriating that which had been carried to the surplus fund—an appropriation which had been made three years ago, but the expenditure of which had been defeated, owing to the difficulties arising with speculators and proprietors of lands in the neighborhood of New York. The only appropriation, therefore, now made, was to reappropriate the amount which had been carried to the surplus fund. He should vote in favor of it, but he hoped no other appropriation would be added to it. And he hoped, also, that no appropriations for new objects of any kind would be made during the present session, except such as were indispensably requisite for public purposes. The amount of appropriations which would be charged upon the revenue of 1839, would probably not be less than twenty-six millions, besides which we had eight millions of Treasury notes to redeem. It would be difficult to devise the ways and means to meet this charge, without suspending some of the appropriations. He repeated the hope, therefore, that no appropriations for new objects would receive the sanction of the House, unless they were of a character not to be dispensed with.

Mr. PARMENTER called the attention of the House to the expenses attending the construction of a dry-dock, which he believed would amount to some five or six hundred thousand dollars. A number of years ago, various sites in the Union had been examined, with a view to ascertain which would be the most proper. A report was made in favor of Charlestown and Gosport, but there were serious objections urged against the establishment of a dry-dock at Brooklyn. In the first place, it was highly important that a dry-dock should be placed in a navy-yard which was accessible at all seasons of the year, so as not to be exposed to the blockade of an enemy. During the last war with Great Britain, the port of New York was entirely blockaded, and it was almost impossible for vessels to get in.

Although it is true (continued Mr. P.) that the Secretary of the Navy has been in favor of the construction of a dry-dock at Brooklyn, yet the Commissioners of the Navy have expressed the opinion that two dry-docks are ample for the wants of the naval service of the United States. We have two already, and no advantage can result from increasing their number, except for use in time of war. If a dry-dock cannot be used in time of war, it seems to me that it is improper to go to the expense of its construction.

The bar of New York prevents the largest sized vessels from entering that port at all times. It has been said that the average draught of ships of the first class is twenty-six feet; of the second class twenty-five feet; of frigates of the first class twenty-two and a half feet; of frigates of the second class twenty-one feet. This bill is accompanied with no report or estimates. The average depth of water on the bar of New York harbor has been estimated at twenty-two feet. It appears to me that the subject ought to be deferred until a future Congress, and, if it be thought necessary to have a new dry-dock, a full examination of the whole subject, and reports and estimates presented, before a system is recommended which would involve the expenditure of so large amounts.

My impression is that the matter should be deferred. There is no necessity existing for the establishment of a dry-dock in Brooklyn. Let an examination be made into the subject, and let us wait till we have such a report as will satisfy the House of the expediency of the project. For my own part, taking into consideration the objections which exist against this particular location, and believing also that if you intend to establish dry-docks upon a general system, you ought to establish one at Philadelphia, I hope the matter will be deferred, at least until the necessity of constructing one at Brooklyn is clearly demonstrated.

Mr. REED would not enter into any debate on this subject, for he hoped that this would turn out to be a business session. He had nothing to say against the construction of a dry-dock at New York. He took it for granted that only one such dock was now about to be provided for, and that one ought to be at New York.

As to the examination spoken of by the gentleman who last addressed the House, [Mr. PARMENTER,] he (Mr. R.) would say that there had been no one question relating to the navy which had been more closely examined than this very question of the construction of a dry-dock at Brooklyn. Three years ago an appropriation had been made for this object, but had been strangely defeated. It was not for him to complain of speculators. He would only say that petitions had been got up to show that some place in the vicinity of New York offered greater advantages for the location of a dry-dock than New York did, and thus its construction had been improperly postponed. The construction of the dock was recommended by the Navy Department. The appropriation was supported by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] although reluctantly, because the necessity of the case was too strong to be resisted. He (Mr. R.) had nothing to say in relation to the South at this time. It was sufficient for him to know that this appropriation was exceedingly needed. The project had been postponed too long already. And as to the objection which one gentleman [Mr. PARMENTER] had made in regard to the depth of the water, did he not know that a ship of the line had just left that port with her crew, her armament, and her munitions and stores on board, and that she had water enough and to spare? There had been numerous reports made on the subject, but the gentleman did not seem fully acquainted with them. The House, however, it was to be presumed, was in possession of the requisite information.

Dry Docks—Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Sergeant, Mr. Fry.

HO. OF REPS.

As to a dry-dock at Philadelphia, he (Mr. R.) would say nothing now. He would speak of it at the proper time. It was obvious that only one appropriation would be made for a dry-dock now. Let it, therefore, be placed where the Department and the just sense of the country have decided that it ought to be placed.

Mr. HOFFMAN said he did not rise to debate this question, but merely to answer a statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PARMENTER.] But, in the first instance, he (Mr. H.) wished to correct an error which pervaded the committee, that this was an appropriation for a dry-dock at New York. Such was not the fact. It was an appropriation for a dry-dock at the city of Brooklyn, on Long Island.

The great purposes of a dry-dock were not to copper and finish vessels. The main object was to place them in a situation where, from the readiness of access to the sea, and the provision of the requisite material, vessels might enter and be promptly repaired in time of service. It was not necessary, however, to dwell on this point.

Nor was he opposed to a dry-dock at Philadelphia. He should cheerfully vote in favor of an appropriation for that purpose, whenever it might be brought before the House. But (continued Mr. H.) from the tone and temper of the House at the present time, I will ask gentlemen whether it is right that a bill, which might otherwise pass with unanimity, should be incumbered by amendments for objects which will defeat their wishes and our own, whether we are hostile to them or not? Let them assist us, and I, for one, will give them my support in favor of a dry-dock at Philadelphia, whenever the question shall be fairly presented.

In reply to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PARMENTER,] I will ask him if he has forgotten that one of the largest ships in the service entered the harbor of New York, and went out with all her guns, crew, and provisions on board? Has he forgotten that Lieutenant Gedney had told the country that he would undertake to beat her out with a head wind; that there was room for her in stays, and that she could enter almost at half-tide? And then I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the objections to this appropriation, even if fortified by reasons and argument, would not come better from any other quarter than from the Representative of a State enjoying the advantages of one of the two dry-docks which the munificence of Congress had erected? The objection would have come with more delicacy from the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] but even he had assented to the appropriation, though believing himself to have good cause of dissatisfaction at the course of policy adopted in these matters towards the southern region of our country.

Mr. SERGEANT said he would not vote in favor of the amendment of his colleague, if he thought it would injure the appropriation for a dry-dock at New York. But he could not think it would be so; if the members were satisfied of the propriety of making a dock at Philadelphia, they would support it in the shape of an amendment; and if they were not, they could not vote for it in this or in any form. The question was not as to the mode, but as to the thing itself.

A great many things had been assumed in relation to Philadelphia, and the navigation of the Delaware river, which stood contradicted by a report made to this House at the last session; and, if there were time, he should probably ask the reading of certain portions of it. This was not a new question. There was ample testimony before the House. It appeared, clearly, that there had already been carried out of Philadelphia many ships of the largest classes, which had been built there, and amongst them some of the finest in the service. And he must here be permitted to say that the navy-yard in Philadelphia was connected, in the most interesting manner, with the history of the navy of the United States—in a manner which entitled it to be cherished.

The first communication (continued Mr. S.) in relation to the building of ships of war that ever passed between our Government and any man or men, was addressed to the Naval Constructor of the city of Philadelphia, the late Joshua Humphreys, father of Samuel Humphreys, United States Naval Constructor.

The first ship of war built in the United States (and it was before the Navy Department was established) was built under the immediate direction of the War Department; and the correspondence, of which I spoke, passed between General Knox, then Secretary of War, and Joshua Humphreys. The latter gentleman built the frigate "United States," and the same man furnished plans and models, and directed the molds of all the vessels built at that time. From that period to this, the Government of the United States has always thought proper to keep the navy-yard at Philadelphia, and the Government is still of that opinion. The art of ship-building has been preserved there; the industry necessary to preserve that art in useful exercise is still to be found there; and experience shows that naval construction can be carried on as well there as in any part of the United States, if not better. The time has come when one of two things is to happen: Philadelphia must either have a dry-dock, or the navy-yard will be abandoned. If other yards have such docks—and not Philadelphia—if they become the ordinary accompaniments of navy-yards, it will be made a standing argument against the yard at Philadelphia, and will finally lead to its destruction. I therefore consider this question neither more nor less than whether the navy-yard there shall be maintained at all. Why should not Philadelphia have a navy-yard, when experience has shown that there are facilities to do the work economically, and hands that will do it faithfully and well?

Here is a report, made from the Naval Committee at the last session of Congress, with a communication from Commodore Stewart to Captain Henry, together with a plan and estimates for a dry-dock, furnished by Mr. Strickland, the engineer. In page 8 of this document is a statement of the vessels of war that have passed over the Delaware river, including the "Pennsylvania," the first ship in the United States. And what is it? Why, that that vessel went safely down the river, drawing twenty-three feet of water—two feet of the tide were already lost—and there were, notwithstanding, from four to five feet under her. The result ascertained—not doubtful, but certain—is, that the largest ships can descend our river with ease and safety. This, then, being the only difficulty, and this being disposed of, what is there on the other side of the question? I will not recapitulate the arguments of my colleague. There is, however, one feature in the case of the Philadelphia station which cannot be too much pressed, and that is the abundance of sweet fresh water there, where the worm cannot live, and a ship can lie forever without danger from its ravages, so destructive in salt water. When we have got such a dock, we can finish our own ships.

What was the course pursued with the Pennsylvania? Deeply mortifying it was to those who had laid her keel, and who had seen her grow until she became the beautiful and gigantic thing she now is, and who were then told that they could not finish her. Why not? Because we had no dry-dock. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] says that a dry-dock is not the place for building ships; but this proves that, in the opinion of the Navy Department, a dry-dock is the place for finishing the building of a ship. Well, she was sent away, the allegation (whether true or not I will not say) being that it was unsafe to copper her before launching, and that she could not be coppered after she was launched at Philadelphia, but must be sent elsewhere. Now, if you are to come to the conclusion that hereafter a ship is neither to be finished nor repaired at Philadelphia, you make a great stride towards the conclusion that there is to be no navy-yard at Philadelphia. This is as sure as the denial of a dry-dock. I refer gentlemen to the report made at the last session of Congress, and to the documents accompanying it. This subject, as I have before said, is not a new one. It has been anxiously examined; and let me say that in these documents you have the pledge of the highest professional reputation, that the construction of a dry-dock at Philadelphia holds out so many advantages as to justify a claim on the Government of the United States; authority which places it on high ground, not only as a fit place, but as holding out peculiar advantages of a very decided character.

Against the dry-dock at Brooklyn I have not a word to say. Common justice requires that there should be one also at Philadelphia, in that navy-yard where your Navy was cradled—where the young Hercules received his first nourishment.

Mr. FRY said he had but little to say in addition to what had already been said upon the subject; he must, however, be permitted to say that his colleague, [Mr. PARMENTER,] in offering the amendment under consideration, could not justly be charged with a desire to load down this bill, as was intimated by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Sir, we from Pennsylvania contend, or shall contend, without any desire to disparage the claim of New York for a dry-dock at Brooklyn, that we hold it a questionable matter whether Philadelphia be not equally entitled to a dry-dock at the navy-yard there. Sir, permit me here to call the attention of the committee to the words of the bill as reported, and now before us. It appropriates $100,000 to the improvement of the navy-yard at Brooklyn, and for building a dry-dock. Now, sir, I understand that that portion of the appropriation which is to be applied to the improvement of the navy-yard, is to purchase the ground for the location of the dock.

Mr. INGHAM (chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) explained.

Mr. FRY. Be that as it may, or be it so, from the very words of the bill, a part of the appropriation was for the improvement of the navy-yard, and the question was, how much of this $100,000 was to be expended upon the navy-yard, and how much for the dock? Is eighty or ninety thousand dollars of this appropriation to be expended at the navy-yard, and the remaining ten or twenty thousand dollars for the dock? How are we to judge upon this point? The committee are left entirely in the dark in this matter. But, sir, if we pass the amendment of my colleague, and give $100,000 to the construction of a dry-dock at Philadelphia, then you have no dispute about the ground, no rights to buy out, and you have an assurance that the money will be appropriated to no other purpose than the building of a dry-dock.

Sir, in what particular does the claims of the yard at Brooklyn stand preëminent to those of the yard at Philadelphia? We are told that it is admitted by all, that there is a necessity for a dry-dock at Brooklyn, New York. Well, what are the reasons assigned? We have this bill, to be sure, but I have seen no report, no argument to give it a preference, or show its peculiar advantages over Philadelphia. On the other hand, accompanying the bill for the erection of a dry-dock at Philadelphia, we have a report from the committee, going into the matter fully, and showing clearly, to my mind, that the site there is inferior to none.

Mr. F. said he would call the attention of the committee to one fact that had been alluded to in the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, for a dock at the Philadelphia yard. He did not recollect the words, but the substance was, that some years ago, perhaps in 1814, a report to the House of Representatives, from some branch of the Navy Department, suggested some place for a dry-dock on the North river, as being out of the reach of approach by foreign vessels. Sir, the idea is a strong one, and let us look for a moment at the site at Philadelphia in this view; while the yard there is easy of approach to our own vessels, under the guidance of the Delaware pilots, it is inaccessible to foreigners who are unacquainted with the navigation of that river. Ships can be building and repairing thereat all times, in perfect safety and security from foreign depredations, which, in time of war, might be of momentous interest to our navy. Over and above that, a dock can be constructed at Philadelphia with less cost than at Brooklyn. Its location is more central between the two docks at Charlestown and Gosport, and it is within a few hours ride of this city.

Mr. F. said he was induced to throw out these suggestions without any antagonist feeling towards the claim of New York, or any other place, for a dry-dock; but, if the subjects of dry-docks must now be examined, he thought his colleague had done well to offer the amendment, in order that we may show that the claims of the Philadelphia yard are entitled to the consideration and respect of this House.

Sir, my notion, long since, has been that there should be a dock at each of the principal yards; but if we are to have but one at this time, where is the argument, where is the reason, where is the report from any source, or which shows the advantages of Brooklyn over Philadelphia? The Secretary of the Navy leaves that matter open. He says: "At some point," without designating either, particularly. Sir, it is not sufficient to give one yard preference over another, to say that it is admitted by all that a dry-dock is wanting at Brooklyn; we want the reasons that shall show this House and the country that any navy-yard has claims over that at Philadelphia.

Considering the course which this debate seems likely to take, I feel much inclined to the idea suggested by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. PARMENTER,] that the whole matter should be postponed until a critical examination be made as to the sites, and necessity of more docks than we have at present; we could then meet the subject more fully, and decide more correctly. I shall, however, cheerfully vote for the amendment offered by my colleague, and feel under obligations to him for his having so promptly brought the subject to the notice of the House.

Mr. POTTER said the amendment of his colleague was direct and positive, and expressed, in plain language, what he desired to be at. The bill to which it was desired to be attached appropriated $100,000 to improve the navy-yard at Brooklyn, and for the erection of a dry-dock. A few thousand dollars would improve and enlarge the navy-yard; but all are aware that it would cost five hundred thousand to build a dry-dock. The minor project takes the first place in the position for appropriation, and the major comes in by way of appendix to it. He would respectfully ask the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] whether the erection of a dry-dock at Brooklyn was or was not a new work, or had there ever been one dollar expended in preparation for the work?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that this was restoring an appropriation made two years ago, and which had been applied to other purposes.

Mr. POTTER. The reply does not meet my inquiry. I have been informed by the chairman of the Naval Committee that this dry-dock is a new work. The reason assigned by the honorable gentleman from New York against the amendment offered by my colleague would seem to me to apply with equal force against the bill. He deprecates, in strong terms, the appropriation of a single dollar out of the Treasury, in its present dilapidated and depressed state, for any new project. The logic of the gentleman is singular to me. For the erection of a dry-dock at Brooklyn—a new work—the appropriation is all very right and proper. For one at Philadelphia, it is destruction to the Treasury. Unless Pennsylvania is inferior in her rights and claims to New York, a distinction which no Pennsylvanian will ever admit, then, sir, Philadelphia stands on an equality with Brooklyn or New York. The memory of the Philadelphia navy-yard is identified with the glory of the Navy. The vessels built there equal in models of beauty, and in superiority of sailing, any vessels built in this or any other portion of the world.

The mechanics in that city equal in skill and science the ship-builders in any port in the Union. In cheapness of building and economy in labor no point on the sea-board can successfully compete with Philadelphia. In advantages in obtaining materials for the construction of vessels of war the port of Philadelphia is admirably situated. Why, then, should there not be a dry-dock connected with the navy-yard at that city? The great ship Pennsylvania was built at the navy-yard in that city, and was removed from the point where built to be finished, because there was no dry-dock. I recollect the burst of dissatisfaction throughout Pennsylvania at the circumstance, and the anxiety expressed that this noble ship should be perfected, and ready to sail on her element, in the State from whence she derived her name. The question is one vital to the existence of the navy-yard at Philadelphia—a navy-yard at which the first ship of war was built in this Union. Mark the prediction! If vessels cannot be finished at Philadelphia, the United States will cease to build at that port. What Pennsylvanian could stand silently by and see the navy-yard at Philadelphia abandoned? that navy-yard, so identified with the naval glory of the nation and the pride of Pennsylvania. At no point on the sea-board could a dry-dock be situated where it would be safer from the aggression of a maritime incursion. The navigation of the Delaware, aided as it is by steam-towing ships, can be ascended with ease. Why, then, should not an appropriation be made for the erection of a dry-dock, connected with the navy-yard at Philadelphia?

Mr. BIDDLE would say one word on a point of fact. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PARMENTER] had said that one dry-dock was sufficient, and that we had more than one already. That was his argument against the bill and the amendment.

Mr. PARMENTER explained. He had said that the chairman of the Board of Navy Commissioners had given it as his opinion that, in time of peace, one dry-dock would be sufficient.

Mr. REED. In what year had he said so?

Mr. PARMENTER. In 1825.

Mr. BIDDLE resumed. We had two dry-docks now, and they were not told how many more would be needed. The bill proposed a dry-dock at Brooklyn, as an extension of that yard—as a convenient appendage to it. But why would not one be an equally convenient appendage to the navy-yard at Philadelphia? As that yard now stood, after a ship had been built there she must be sent to Norfolk or to Boston to be finished; and this would hereafter be used as an argument against building Government ships at Philadelphia at all. It would be said, why take two ports to complete your ship when one will answer? Why not lay the keel where the vessel can be fitted for sea? That was the argument and the feeling in behalf of New York, and why Philadelphia was to be deprived of the advantage—merely to furnish an argument against building ships there. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] had promised the friends of the amendment that, if they would withdraw it now, and not incur the present bill, when another should be introduced for a like improvement at Philadelphia, he would lend them his voice and aid. This was the very sort of argument that the purest gentlemen of the South were startled at. But let not gentlemen look at vague promises, but at the natural workings of the human heart when the object sought had been attained. Why had the gentleman from New York rebuked the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PARMENTER,] and accused him of selfish motives? Because he felt the pride of his State interested that the public ships should be built there. And would not the same pride operate in behalf of New York when Pennsylvania shall hereafter come and ask that she may be put on an equal footing? Before any such feeling should have time to grow up, instead of taking vague promises and relying on them, why not now, at once, do equal justice to Pennsylvania? This was the time—the fit and proper time; nor could he see why it should be postponed, unless for some sinister purpose not avowed.

Mr. DAWSON said he had listened to the debate with attention, and had watched the workings of interest on the different gentlemen who had taken part in it. It was with reluctance he was compelled to see how these things were managed. We of the South (said Mr. D.) remain silent at our seats when questions of great interest to the country are agitated; and why? Because whenever we have asked our equal share with the rest of the Union, we have always failed. I have, from time to time, applied here even for a navy-yard at any port south of Norfolk; and how often have I failed? Just as often as I have asked. And why is this? Because we have not the talent at getting up the necessary arrangements. Is that it? We are told the objects we desire are proper, but the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tells us there is not a dollar in the Treasury. Thus I find that those who are more modest get nothing. Here there is a navy-yard and a dry-dock at Gosport; a navy-yard here at Washington; another at Portsmouth; another at New York; a navy-yard and dry-dock at Boston. Well, sir, now look at the South; ay, sir, along the whole coast of the Atlantic and round into the Gulf of Mexico, and where is the protection for our commerce from any establishment of the United States? They will send us ships, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, whenever we need them. Yes, sir, and when we need aid and ask for it, perhaps that will be the moment when none can be sent. When we want any repairs done, the vessels must be sent round to Norfolk or to Boston. What other Government in the civilized world ever pursued such a policy? Go to England; how many dry-docks has she? More, by one, than we have. But the gentleman says she has two or three dry-docks at the same navy-yard. Well, sir, if that is necessary, we can do the same; and then the mechanics and all the conveniences will be together on the spot, and there will not be the difficulty now complained of. But this is not the point. You are now asked to appropriate for New York and Philadelphia $100,000 apiece. How much do you usually appropriate for the increase of the navy in one year? and how many new vessels do you need in the same time? I will venture to predict that if we are to have four dry-docks, as proposed, they will not have a vessel apiece in any one year. I shall oppose both the bill and amendment. Not because I am opposed to either city; I would vote the money with great pleasure, if I honestly believed it was required; but I cannot believe these dry-docks necessary. If a new one is necessary, it must be south of the Chesapeake Bay.

I call upon this House, (said Mr. D.) instead of establishing all the navy-yards and building all the dry-docks at the North, to do an act of justice to the South, and give us an appropriation for our protection. Suppose an enemy should attack us, where are we to look for aid? "Government will send us vessels." Ay! but where is a navy-yard? There is none south of Norfolk. Yet we are to give the North new navy-yards and new dry-docks. Before you pour out your money from the Treasury—but I forget, the gentleman from New York tells us there is none there to pour out—well, sir, when you pledge the country to further appropriations of money for objects of this kind, do it for the South; not because it is the South, but because it is a defenseless portion of this Union. Last session, my friend [Mr. LEGARE] asked for the establishment of only a navy-yard at Charleston, the great commercial emporium of the South, but he could get none. I asked one for the whole coast of Georgia, and the reply I got was: "We will send you help whenever you need it." Sir, this language is becoming unpleasant in our ears. If we belong to the Government, we have our rights, and they should be respected; but they never will be, so long as we lend our aid to put a navy-yard and a dry-dock in every port of the North. More dry-docks are unnecessary, but, if any are built, they should be at the South. Let us treat all justly, before we do over-much for any one port.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] seems to manifest an extraordinary solicitude to get the floor—for what? Not for a navy-yard, sir; no! that she has got; but for a dry-dock in addition to a navy-yard. We ask only for a navy-yard at the South; for what New York has got, and we have not. He says that if we vote this boon to New York, he will hereafter vote something of the kind for others. If we will vote for New York, then he will vote for the South. But, sir, the claims of the South rest on no such bargain; they depend not on what price shall be paid, but on what has been paid already; and the way for us to get our rights is to keep any more from being given to New York, and to the North, until we get them.

Mr. WISE. I want to get clear of this bill; and if this debate goes on any further, I shall move to lay it on the table. A word only in reply to the gentleman from Georgia who has just resumed his seat. I will answer his question, why we cannot get a navy-yard and dry-dock at the South. He asked whether it was for the want of talent? I will tell him it is for the want of that sort of talent which is required to get boons out of this Government. There is not a man in all the southern delegation on this floor that has the sort of talent for that business. It is not owing to any want of disposition on the part of the House, nor on that of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that the three contending ports of the South have not, long ere this, got what they claim. The committee have been waiting for the friends of the several claims of Charleston, Brunswick, and Beaufort, to come forward with authentic reports and the necessary surveys and estimates to show that there is the necessary depth of water, and the other concomitants which go to render any spot a fit location for a navy-yard. In regard to Charleston, the committee has had a number of reports, but though there has been a member from Georgia on the Naval Committee ever since I was there, yet nothing has yet been done.

Mr. DAWSON reminded the gentleman from Virginia that Commodore Woolsey and Captain Shubrick had made reports in favor of Brunswick, and had recommended it as a proper place for a naval depot.

Mr. WISE admitted this; but there were not reports from the Department like those in favor of Charleston. When the committee were urged to do something for the South, particularly for Charleston, he would tell his friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE] how the proposal had been met: A gentleman from North Carolina had come to the committee, and asked that they would delay the selection of a depot till reports should be received in regard to all the ports claiming the benefit; and he would tell the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] that all the committee ever got in relation to Brunswick was from a northern man and a speculating company.

Mr. DAWSON said there had been a report from the Navy Commissioners in its favor, which had been printed by order of the House.

Mr. WISE. But none from the Department. I have, myself, no opposition to Brunswick; on the contrary, I believe it to be the best of the three; and if proper reports shall be furnished to us, I am ready to vote for it. But I will tell my friend how these things are obtained. At the North private individuals interest themselves in the improvement of the country as means of raising the value of property; they are more watchful, more vigilant, more active, more pushing than we. Georgia has the only proper site for a depot between Norfolk and the Capes of Florida, and yet nothing was done in its favor till a Boston company purchased land there, and erected on it houses, which had been framed and fitted and made, all ready to put up, in New England; and their object now is to get a navy-yard established there, that they may improve the value of their lands; they are active; on the alert; and they will soon have a fine Yankee town there. Now, this is an enterprise which a Georgia Legislature would never once have thought of. It would never have entered into their dreams. And the honest truth is just this: we are not so active, not so watchful, not so enterprising as they are; and that is the reason they get what we cannot. The moment they get hold of a proper site, they beset and besiege the engineers and the Department till, by hook or by crook, they get a report in its favor. If the gentleman from Georgia will go to work in the same way, I suppose he can get as large an amount of Government appropriations as they can.

I say this in no spirit of reproach. I consider it as a compliment to the northern people. It forms the characteristic difference between the population of the North and the South. We in the South claim to be high-minded, gentlemanly, lordly fellows, who think nothing of money; and, therefore, we are poor.

Sir, I hope we shall get the question. For myself, I shall vote against both the dry-docks. I think we have as many as we need; and I doubt if we have now the money to pay for them. I again give notice that if the debate is continued, I shall move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. PETRIKIN said, that in early life he had been taught that men were elected to Congress by their respective parties, to support and carry out certain fixed principles which the successful party professed to advocate, and that members so chosen were bound to vote for the measures of their respective parties; that until very lately, he had continued in that belief, but he found he was much mistaken in his impressions. His mistake was not confined to any one of the political parties, whether Democratic or Federal; for recent experience had shown, that when money was the question, that many of each party were ready to abandon all their party pledges and principles, and associate together for the purpose of consummating any scheme to filch and trick the people out of their money. When speculation was in the way, many members of Congress forget whether they were Democrats, Federalists, or Whigs, and associated together in a scramble for the public purse with a view of getting as much of the money of the country, each delegation for its own particular section of the Union, and if not directly for their own individual use, for that of their constituents, regardless of all other considerations than those of self-interest, trampling under foot all constitutional obligations or regard for the general interest and prosperity of the country.

Mr. P. was opposed to all partial legislation, or making laws for the benefit of particular sections of the country, to the manifest injury and prejudice of the rest of the Union. He had observed, day after day, and week after week, the time of Congress consumed by members declaiming against the extravagance of the Government, and the increase of the expenses of the present Administration; and yet, on all occasions, he found those men ready to advocate and vote for all appropriations, regardless of whether the money thus voted was for useful and necessary purposes or not. He had listened to members on all sides of the House, making speeches for home consumption, inculcating economy and retrenchment, but the moment a bill was brought into the House, granting thousands and tens of thousands of the public treasure in the shape of pensions to generals, colonels, captains, or commodores, or the widows of some of the aristocracy, without the color of right, either in law or equity, or millions to be expended in the erection of dry-docks, fortifications, artificial harbors, useless light-houses, or vessels of war, to rot in the harbors, those noisy preachers of economy, both Democrats and Federalists, were found, almost to a man, in the support of what they wished to be thought by the people they were opposing. He said he could not have patience with such selfish inconsistency. Let a meritorious but poor old soldier apply for relief, or an honest claim be brought forward, which does not go to enrich their constituents, then we are told by these men that the Government has no money, and that we must not make any new appropriations, or a national debt must be created; yet these very men, almost in the same breath, when it suited their purposes, would vote for the most extravagant sums to contribute to their own local interests or further their political schemes or private ambition. He could see no bounds to this iniquitous system. He was opposed to both the bill and amendment, on the grounds that the public service did not require at present the erection of a dry-dock, either at New York or Philadelphia. If a dry-dock was necessary at those places, it was necessary at every navy-yard. Money ought not to be appropriated at any time for purposes which were not of a general benefit, or for services rendered to the country, especially at a time when it is more than probable the money will have to be raised by taxes, either indirectly in the shape of an iniquitous tariff, taking the money from the many and industrious part of the people, to put into the pockets of the few idlers, speculators, and loafers, or directly, on the property of the people; either way the taxes must be paid by the producers and consumers, and not by the bankers and speculators who are fattened by creating methods of taxing and burdening the people.

Mr. P. denied that those works were necessary for the public interest. They might say what they pleased; but the most careless observer must see that it was private interest, and not public good, that was the ruling principle of action in all these cases. What care those who were the promoters of these species of works about the welfare of the public? The fact was, that when a few speculators have a lot of land they thought they could make a good market of, or a stone quarry, or the prospect of an office for themselves or some relative to superintend the erection of the work, they immediately laid their heads together, and formed a plan for the erection of a dry-dock, a light-house, a fortification, a harbor, or anything else by which they could make a good speculation, by getting a law passed authorizing the work, and compelling the Government to buy their land, give them the stone contract, or, by management, get both, and the office of superintendent into the bargain. He denied that the sum asked in the present bill was for the interest of the public. No man on the floor could conscientiously deny but that we had dry-docks enough for all the purposes of our navy; and why lay the foundation for an expenditure of two or three millions of dollars, when the public service does not require it?

Members who advocated this bill talked about the necessity of providing for ship-building, and the protection and welfare of our navy. But the recent history of the country had taught him a lesson about ship-building which he could not forget. Was it not a fact that most of our large ships had been built, at an immense cost, for the sole purpose of putting the money of the country raised off the honest yeomanry into the pockets of, comparatively speaking, a few speculators and contractors, and keeping in idleness and luxury a set of sinecure officers? He would name some of those vessels to refresh the apparently short memories of some gentlemen. The Ohio ship of the line made one voyage, and then was laid away to rot, and had just been rebuilt, scarcely a single plank, spike, or bolt of the old vessel remaining of her first construction, and nothing else except the name. Again: there was the Independence, which shared a worse fate; she was not only suffered to rot, but when rebuilt reduced in size, and the apology was that those nuisances, the Commissioners of the Navy, or some one of them, had interfered in the first place, and spoilt her so that she could not be used. He also named other instances of ships having been built and suffered to remain in harbor and rot, because there was no use for them, and not for want of a dry-dock to repair them in.

Mr. P. said that our navy had degenerated ever since it had fallen under the special care of speculators and jobbers; our ships were not so good in their construction, nor was there that character attached to the officers. It had ceased to be the object of emulation among a large proportion of our officers who should excel the other in discipline, but the great object now was who should get the most money and do the least service. There were some few honorable exceptions among the officers of the Navy, but a reference to the pension list would exhibit a deplorable falling off in that pride of character which stimulated the officers of the Navy to deeds of glory, which astonished the world during the late war with England. Where, (said Mr. P.) must we look for the cause of all this? To the improper legislation of Congress. It is the fault of the representatives of the people, who forget their duty and vote away the money of the country with a prodigality which indicates not only a want of political principle, but also a want of moral honesty. Mr. P. said he could not find fault with the conduct of the members of Congress who were Federalists. They, in voting for this bill, and all others of the like kind, acted in accordance with their avowed doctrines and principles. High taxes, a national debt, a large navy, and a standing army, are among the old and favorite themes of the Federal party. But those professing Democrats who, when at home, wish their constituents to believe that they are opposed to Federal doctrines and measures, will find some trouble to reconcile their votes in this House for measures, the inevitable consequences of which are to increase the taxes, create a national debt in time of peace, build up a navy and army, and all the necessary appurtenances belonging to them, with Democratic doctrines and their own professions. Mr. P. said he came to Congress the representative of Democrats who were the uncompromising advocates of "equal rights," were willing to be taxed when it was necessary for the support of Government, the protection of the country's rights, or the avenging of its wrongs. But his constituents were opposed to the extravagant expenditure of the revenue in useless and expensive works. They were opposed to raising money by taxing unnecessarily the many for the use of the few. In fact, their maxim was the old Democratic creed of equal and exact justice to every part of the nation; and they did not wish to take their neighbors' property illegally, nor invade his rights; nor were they willing to have their property illegally taken, nor their constitutional rights invaded.

Mr. P. said that he had endeavored, during the two last sessions of Congress, to adhere to and support the true Democratic principles. That, on a late occasion, his conduct had been canvassed before his constituents, and he felt proud of their verdict of approval of his political course. He had uniformly voted against all appropriations of the nature of those contained in the bill now before the committee. He should willingly vote for money to keep up as many vessels of war as the service of the country required, and for navy-yards and dry-docks enough for all the purposes of keeping our present navy in good repair.

Mr. P. said he was not a little amused to witness with what avidity and zeal members from a particular section, whose constituents were to receive the benefit of those appropriations, pressed the passage of bills to raise money for their own particular districts. They forget all their professions of Democracy, and their principles, whenever money was held up to their view, and they sprang at it like a mackerel at a red rag. Gentlemen might clamor and laugh at his language, but he would tell them that he spoke the language of sincerity and truth, as he had been taught to do from his cradle. He had always been taught to advocate his principles fearlessly, in all places, and on all occasions, and he would do so now in spite of the clamor of any man, or set of men. He was the representative of freemen, and, as such, would express, in his own language, and in his own way, the opinions of those who had elected him, caring not who approved or disapproved of what he said. He was accountable only to God and his constituents.

As for the proposed dry-dock at Pensacola, (Mr. P. said,) there appeared to be some plausibility in it from the geographical situation of that city. He had not seen any recommendation of it by the Department; but in the present state of the finances, he could not vote for any increase of expenditure that could possibly be avoided. He said that he felt much pleased with the disclosure made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] as to the manner in which most of those projects were gotten up. The gentleman had let the cat out of the bag, and the friends of the bill did not attempt to contradict it. The plan was, when a few designing men wished for a public work for their own interest, they would come on to Washington, and commence operations by teasing and importuning, night and day, officers of the engineer department and members of Congress for the furtherance of their views. They would intrigue at noonday and at night, when they ought to be in their beds, to gain their ends, and it was generally found that, by "hook or by crook," they succeeded. This was the way the public money got filched from the people.

Mr. P. said, that although he could easily account for some members of Congress from the northern and middle States voting for bills of the character of the present one, yet he confessed himself totally at a loss how to account for the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] advocating so useless and extravagant an appropriation, whose constituents were opposed to the whole system of legalized swindling that had been practiced by Congress for several years past. He thought the gentleman might see that a continuance of that course must eventuate in an increase of the tariff, or a national debt, which, like all other encroachments on the constitutional rights of the citizen, was odious in the sight of every Democrat.

Mr. P. said he would ask the attention of members to the millions that had been expended in and about New York within the last few years for the erection of forts, light-houses, navy-yards, &c. A custom-house is about being built in that city which will cost $3,000,000 before it is finished, although the first estimated cost was not much over a fourth part of that sum. This building, he was told, will look more fit for the palace of an eastern Satrap than for store-houses of a plain Republican Government.

As to the statement made of the probable cost of the proposed dry-dock, Mr. P. said it was all fallacious; for, from his experience of estimates made for the erection of public works by engineers, there was no dependence to be placed on them, and all safe calculators would add fourfold to the estimated cost of the work as being much nearer the truth than the estimate made by the engineers. He said he would repeat that he opposed the passage of the bill because there was no necessity for the work, in his opinion, at any time, but especially at a time when he was told the Treasury was empty. He hoped every consistent Democrat would be found recording his name against not only this bill, but all of a like kind, during this session.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to amend the amendment by adding an appropriation of $100,000 for a navy-yard at Pensacola.

Mr. ELMORE obtained the floor, but, on solicitation, yielded it to

Mr. HOFFMAN, who observed that a remark he had accidentally let fall when last up had excited the rebuke of some of the puritans of the House, who looked with maidenly abhorrence on everything like bargains and log-rolling in this House. He would remind his friends from Pennsylvania and Georgia [Mr. BIDDLE and Mr. DAWSON] that the companionship of which they complained had been no secret collusion, but a union in views proclaimed openly on that floor. Nor did he see how any principle was violated when a man who was a friend to two measures advised the friends of the latter one proposed that they had better take one at a time, lest they should lose both. If he had been opposed to the second measure, and, for the sake of carrying the first, had promised to compromise his views of propriety and vote for the second when it should come up, then there might be some room for the charge of bargaining and of sacrificing principle. He had professed himself friendly to a dry-dock at Philadelphia. He was friendly to it; and he did not see how he had been guilty of any least violation of the dignity of legislation, or of the purity of the House, by pledging himself to vote for it in a separate bill hereafter. But he had offended the honorable gentleman, his friend from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] because that gentleman had not been successful in obtaining his favorite object for the benefit of the South. A part of the reasons, if it were so, might perhaps have been stated with some truth by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] But was the fact really so? Had the South been thus neglected in favor of the North? He remembered a certain chart referred to on a former occasion by the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS] in which he had undertaken to pursue the course of the public money, which was said to flow, like the Gulf stream, always towards the Northern and Eastern States, and, following it, he had found that in Georgia he was further North than when he had set out from Massachusetts; and when he got to New Orleans, he had found himself at the North Pole. Whence had the millions flowed that were spent in driving out the southern Indians? and the millions more that had gone to consummate the Georgia lottery, and enable the gentleman's constituents to draw some of the highest prizes? His friend over the way [Mr. BIDDLE] was afraid that, after the bargain was made by which New York was to get her dry-dock, when it came to giving Philadelphia hers, the bargain would not be consummated, and the rights of Pennsylvania would be forgotten in the overweening jealousy of New York, and her fear of the aggrandizement of Philadelphia. Now, he would say to that honorable gentleman, that New York was proud of Pennsylvania for many things; she was proud of her on account of her talented delegation on this floor; she was proud of her for her noble projects of internal improvement; she had not been so proud of her on account of last winter's proceedings; but for New York, as a State, to be jealous of Pennsylvania, or for New York city to be afraid of the aggrandizement of Philadelphia, he could only say that New York felt herself too big to be jealous of anybody. He acknowledged that Philadelphia was one of the brightest jewels in the fair crown of this Confederacy; he admired the beauty and cleanliness of her streets; her abundance of fresh and wholesome water; and owned that New York could boast of nothing equal to her Fairmount. But New York never could be jealous of her. Philadelphia should have his aid, and he doubted not the aid of every New Yorker, when her project for a dry-dock came up as a distinct measure here. New York loved and respected her as a younger sister, and, he would add, a weaker sister; for, in point of natural advantages of situation, she was so.

Mr. H. concluded by saying that he had no personal interest in the present bill whatever; and his sole reason for opposing the amendment, was that it might lead to the defeat of both objects desired.

Mr. ELMORE said, that until within a few minutes past, he had not intended to say a word on this question. I seldom trouble this body with any remarks—on mere party questions, I might say never—believing its time would, generally, be far better employed in the business of the country. I rise now, sir, because in want of information on a measure of great importance, which I conceive that the part of the country which I in part represent, is much interested in. I have looked in vain for the information which was necessary to direct me in the discharge of my duty on this question. I find no report of the committee, nor of competent engineers, showing either that the dry-dock asked for is necessary, or what is the scale or plan of its construction, or what it will cost, or if it is necessary, whether there is not a location for it which will be more useful and proper. It was more with a view to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs for information on these heads, than with any view of entering into the discussion, that I have taken the floor.

The first question presented, sir, to my mind by this bill was, is another dry-dock necessary to the navy? And if it be necessary, then the next questions are, what would be its best location? What will it cost? Where are the surveys and estimates? And when were they made? There are already two dry-docks, one at Charlestown, in Massachusetts, and one at Gosport, in Virginia. They cost, it is said, nearly $1,000,000 a piece. Is another necessary? Most especially is it our duty to make that inquiry now, and before we go into this work, because our Treasury is well nigh beggared, and no works not absolutely necessary should be begun. There is no report of this committee accompanying the bill showing the necessity for this dock, no surveys, no estimates of cost, no plan of the works. Are we to go blindfold into this business? The bill asks for $100,000; but who does not know that this is but a drop in the bucket? Two million dollars will more probably be expended before the work is completed; and if the amendment for the one at Philadelphia prevails, a like sum may be added for that.

If there be another dry-dock necessary for the security or efficiency of the navy and the honor and welfare of the country, which is intimately blended with it, I am ready and willing to go all lengths for it, even to the taxing my constituents to the division of their last dollar. But it is precisely because I cannot see either its necessity or what it is to cost, or that it is proposed to give it the most proper location, that I have risen to ask for information from the chairman of the committee, and I now hope the chairman will put me right before I proceed further in my remarks.

Mr. INGHAM (chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) stated that there were reports showing the necessity of another dry-dock, and read from the last report of the Secretary of the Navy in favor of one at New York. That the one at Charlestown, that at Gosport, and the one at Brooklyn, were all projected on the same plan, and estimates made for them, by an engineer of high reputation, (Mr. Baldwin,) in 1825. That he estimated they would cost each $300,000, but the one at Charlestown cost $677,089, and that at Gosport $977,356, the average being about $827,000, and he supposed the one at Brooklyn would cost about that sum. The committee had no other estimates.

Mr. ELMORE resumed. I have not had my doubts removed, Mr. Chairman, by the honorable gentleman's statements. The necessity of this additional dry-dock is not unquestionable—they are required only for repairs of a certain character. We never had one before those at Charlestown and Gosport were built, which has been but a very few years past. When, in 1824, Congress first entertained the scheme for making dry-docks, a call was made on the Commissioners of the Navy for information on the subject; that able, faithful, and gallant veteran, Commodore Rodgers, as their organ, replied, that during peace "a single dry-dock might be made to answer the wants of our present force; but under other circumstances, when the disposition of our vessels may be controlled by a variety of events, it will be found essentially necessary to have at least two of our yards provided with this accommodation—one upon the waters of the Chesapeake, and another upon the eastern coast."—[1st Sess. 19th Cong., Ex. Doc. No. 143.] Now, sir, those two here recommended have been constructed, and located, in my judgment, wisely—one at the eastern extremity of the Union, and one near the center of the Atlantic coast; and I now, sir, insist, that if a third be built, it should be beyond the dangerous capes of Florida, giving to each extremity, as well as the center of the coast, this necessary appendage to the navy. But, sir, has the chairman of the Naval Committee shown the necessity to exist for a third dry-dock, especially now? Has he shown the plans and estimates for its construction? what it is to cost? He tells us, sir, that the plan is the same as that at Gosport and that at Charlestown, and that the estimates for this at Brooklyn were made by the same engineer, at the same time, and that each of the three was to cost only $300,000, while the two which have been constructed cost an average of $820,000, nearly three times the estimate. And, sir, I am satisfied that before this work is finished, on the scale which will be insisted on by those who urge it, as required by the great commercial emporium it is intended to benefit, it will have cost nearer $2,000,000 than $1,000,000.

Sir, I must say with my friend from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,] if another is necessary, that every principle of equity and sound policy dictates that it should be placed towards the other extremity of the Union. From Norfolk to Texas—more than two thirds of your coast—where is there any adequate means of building, repairing, or fitting out your ships? Why is it that all this section of country at the South, which contributes so much to your commerce and revenue, is to be overlooked and neglected? From it, sir, comes five sixths of all the domestic exports of your whole country, which are the main source and support of that stupendous commerce which you carry on with all the world, enriching every section, and filling the public coffers with its revenues; and yet, sir, you never think of establishing navy-yards along this coast, nor a dry-dock at any part of it.

Sir, I am glad that my friend and colleague has offered his amendment for Pensacola. It is the great harbor of the Gulf of Mexico, through which passes the immense commerce of the West and Southwest. Every dictate of common prudence and common justice requires that the rich products poured out of the bosom of these immense countries upon that gulf should have full and adequate protection from your Navy. It is the scene of frequent piracy and shipwrecks innumerable. At this moment, sir, you have the highest admonitions of this, when France, by her fleets, is carrying on war with our neighbors in these very waters, winning strongholds, and making conquests upon our borders; while England, who never sleeps when the interests of the people are at stake, we are informed, has a strong fleet either there or on its way to the scene of operations. Has the House calculated the immense interests we have at stake there? And can any statesman who does estimate them properly, hesitate in supporting the establishment not only of an extensive navy-yard and depot there, but of a dry-dock also, if another is to be added to those we already have? In what, sir, are the local claims of Pensacola behind those of Brooklyn? Why crowd all the naval conveniences in one section, and in such contiguity? There is no dry-dock within a thousand miles of it, and there are two within one fourth of that from Brooklyn. Why should your ships, injured and disabled as they frequently must be, and requiring the repairs to be had in dry-docks, be forced to double the dangerous capes of Florida, and make a voyage to Gosport or Charleston for repairs—a voyage often dangerous in peace, and often impossible in war? The depth of its harbor, which is one of the most capacious and safe in the United States, is abundantly great for any ship. Its bar at low tides affords twenty-two feet water, which can easily be increased to thirty or forty if required. The tides rise but little; the water is quiescent; no rivers of any size empty into it; and there is no danger to be apprehended that the channel, which can be easily opened to any depth, will again fill up. The surveys made more than a hundred years ago by the French, those afterwards by the English, and still later by our own officers, show, sir, that the depth of water remains the same, wholly unchanged. It has a temperate and healthy climate, and abundance of pure water; and the live oak and other naval stores are the natural and abundant products of the surrounding country. By a safe inland navigation, which a trifling expense will make complete, as well as by its railroads now in progress, communications will be opened to all parts of that boundless country watered by the Mississippi, from whence can be poured down to it everything needed for subsistence or defense. I repeat, sir, that if another dry-dock is required, it is for this neglected portion of the country. Here, sir, it is needed; here it would be useful in peace, and in war indispensable; and here, sir, I will vote for it most cheerfully. You have wrung millions on millions from the South by your unequal and unjust taxation, and it is time, high time, she should begin to know this Government by its blessings rather than its oppressions.

I have, Mr. Chairman, a word to say upon the cost which it is proposed by this bill and the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PAYNTER] to incur. The bill proposes $100,000 for the dry-dock at Brooklyn; the amendment $100,000 more for Philadelphia. But, sir, this is but the beginning; that at Brooklyn will not cost short of $1,000,000, and will probably go considerably beyond it. We have estimates for that at Philadelphia, from the Department. They are as follows:

For a water-lock.....	$824,071 00
For dry-dock.....	635,980 00
And if constructed on best plan add.....	150,000 00
	$1,610,051 00

Three millions will, I am satisfied, be nearer the mark. Now, sir, is this committee prepared to pledge itself and the country to these works, unnecessary as they are in this section of the Union, where two already exist, in the present condition of your Treasury? Are you not now struggling with infinite difficulty to keep up the ordinary expenses of this Government? Are not your necessary, indispensable expenditures constantly increasing? And does not your revenue decrease periodically, every two years, by the reduction in your tariff, fixed by law? How, sir, when your expenses rise above, and your revenue sinks below, the point of equality, will you have the means to continue useless and wasteful appropriations? Sir, I beg leave to say one word of warning to gentlemen before they plunge their hands into the public purse so freely, to seize on the treasures of the people, and scatter them abroad on unnecessary undertakings. If they expect to find the means of supplying waste and extravagance in the increase of the tariff, which is their only resource, they will be mistaken. The South has submitted its last; wronged and oppressed as it has been, it never will be again. Deeply has its dearest interests been wounded; and resolutely and determinedly will it oppose an unyielding resistance to every attempt for the renewal or enforcement of that system of unequal, unjust, and oppressive taxation, under which it was, for so long a time, plundered for the benefit of other sections.

Mr. C. SHEPARD, of North Carolina, said he had not expected to be dragged into this debate; but the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] called for some notice on his part. That gentleman had said that it was owing to a want of industry and attention in a gentleman from North Carolina, representing the Newbern district, that had prevented the establishment of a navy-yard at the South. After this, he should be justified in troubling the House with some explanation. Fifteen months ago he had offered a resolution for an inquiry into the fitness of Beaufort for a naval station. Finding, on his return to Congress, that nothing had been done, he addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, inquiring into the reason, and had been informed that the officer charged with the examination had been taken off to be united to the exploring expedition. He had inquired at the last session of the present Secretary whether such a survey would not be made during the summer, and he had been assured it should be done. Since then he had written another letter, informing him of the fact, and inquiring into the reason. He said this: that his constituents might be able to judge whether he had neglected his duty. Whatever the gentleman from Virginia might think, Mr. S. was not responsible for the failure.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman has gone off just as if I had made a personal attack upon him. I stated, and stated truly, that the Naval Committee had been waiting for a report, at the request of the gentleman, before they decided between Beaufort, Charleston, and Brunswick; that, in my opinion, some injustice had been done to Charleston by the delay.

Mr. SHEPARD resumed. The gentleman had said that the reason why more was not done for the southern States was, that their Representatives were not so active and diligent, and, in plain words, not so cunning at getting appropriations, as those from some other sections of the country.

Mr. WISE. The remark was general. I take a full share of it to myself. I am sorry I have not a little more of that cunning myself.

Mr. SHEPARD. As to the bill, the true question is this: whether an additional dry-dock is necessary for the service, and whether New York is the proper location for it. We had now one in New England, and one in Virginia; and where ought the other to be? The documents read declared that at least one more dock was required; if so, it ought to be in some section of the Union where a large and valuable commerce stood in need of protection. Was New York the proper place? He thought not. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] had referred to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] as having formerly shown that more money had been appropriated for the South than for the North; that when he got to Georgia he found himself further north than in Massachusetts; and when he came to Louisiana, he found himself at the north pole. Mr. S. well remembered the speech of the honorable gentleman; it was not in relation to appropriations, but to the money left on deposit with the State banks. It was in reference to this that the gentleman endeavored to show that the South was more favored than the North. He would leave it to the committee to say whether this was logic or sophistry. If any one wanted to know which got the most of the public money, let them look at the annual appropriation bills, and he would soon find that for every thousand dollars appropriated for objects at the South, one hundred thousand was appropriated for those at the North. He did not complain of this when it was really necessary; but could no more equal plan be pursued? As to the money given for the Florida war, he asked, was the money appropriated for the support of that war expended in Florida? No. Where were the supplies obtained? where were the contracts made? In Florida? No; the appropriations went somewhere else. North Carolina got nothing. But could it indeed be necessary that we should have a dry-dock at New York, and another at Philadelphia too? while we had a third so near as Norfolk? while there was none all the way from Norfolk to New Orleans?

Dry Docks—Mr. Pickens, Mr. Petrikin, Mr. Stanly.

HO. OF REPS.

There was one thing he had seen here long, and that was, that whenever an appropriation was asked for a particular region, all the Representatives from that quarter went for it in solid column, while at the same time they professed to care nothing about getting the public money; but this unity of action said more than many speeches. If we must have another dry-dock, let it be placed at some point near the mouth of the Mississippi. They of the South might, perhaps, not be so sedulous and importunate as northern gentlemen; but was that a good reason why the South should not get her full share? Because they were unwilling to come cringing and crawling and playing the sycophant. He thought it was a reason the other way; the Government ought rather to be magnanimous, and give more to those who ask less. The gentleman made another remark he would notice: he had said that the North, by being more industrious and persevering, would go on to take everything from their southern neighbors; they came and speculated on our lands under our very eyes, and were building up Yankee towns on southern soil. If the gentleman wished to lecture the South for its good by such remarks as these, the proper place to do it was at the South, not here; this was not a fitting place for southern men to tell the faults of their own parent.

But all this was out of the track. The question was whether the dock was needed, and whether New York was the proper place were both the proposed docks necessary? He thought neither was needed, but if any was built it ought to be at the South.

MR. PICKENS said that as, when up before, he sustained this appropriation in the original bill of $100,000 for a dry-dock at New York, he now felt, from the range of discussion, disposed to make a few more remarks in addition to what he had already said. He would first notice what had fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [MR. PETRIKIN.] That gentleman had given us a very good lecture on economy and Democratic principles, and had thought proper to extend a portion of it to him, (MR. P.) He was surprised to find gentlemen from the South, who had heretofore been good economists, ranged in support of this appropriation! All this was good doctrine, and (MR. P.) only regretted that the gentleman's practice had not entirely corresponded with his precept. He (MR. P.) had taken that gentleman last session as his file leader on economy. The gentleman had even set his cue to the tune of economy, that we might follow in his wake; but, sir, when we came to voting appropriations for the Cumberland road, what was my astonishment when I found my file leader wheeling to the right about, and voting ay! And is this the gentleman to rise here now, and read me a lecture on economy, because I choose to support an appropriation of $100,000 for a branch of your naval service, while he supported an appropriation of near a million for the Cumberland road?

I will not condescend to institute a comparison between the two objects. Sir, I glory in supporting liberal appropriations for everything connected with your navy. It is the only safe and efficient arm of national defense in a free republic; and some of the very gentlemen who will now vote against this appropriation, you will find, at the close of the session, voting what they have thereby saved, and millions more, to dig out harbors upon your inland seas, where God and nature never intended that any should be. Many gentlemen who will now vote down such appropriations as the present, will combine hereafter in a scheme of legislation under appropriations for your Cumberland road, your light-house and harbor bills, and your other thousand miserable local appropriations, by which private speculators have been enabled to swindle the country out of millions, and yet all this is sound economy!

The true and only questions before the committee are, is a dry-dock needed at New York, and is this appropriation fit and proper? Upon these points there is a concurrence of sentiment in those who have considered the matter. Where can such an establishment with more propriety be located than in New York, the center of commerce and navigation, and, notwithstanding all her sins, in a commercial point of view, the pride of the Republic? We now lose more, for want of a dry-dock at that point, in two years, by the decay and injury of our vessels of war, than would be required to construct the dock. From the extreme northern point on the coast of Maine to Cape Cod, from Cape Cod to Cape Hatteras, and from Cape Hatteras to Cape Florida, and from thence to the Sabine, by examination of the map you will find between each of these prominent points great bays or indentures in the coast of the United States; and there ought to be in the center of each navy-yard on the most liberal and substantial basis—one at Boston, one at New York, one at Charleston, and one at Pensacola. With more than two thousand miles of sea-coast, and a comparatively sparse population, it is vain and idle to think of any other efficient system of fortification or national defense except by a navy. In the next great conflict, your land fortifications, which have been copied from the French system, will be as impotent and useless (except at isolated points) as are the castles in ruins that now frown over Europe, transmitting to us nothing but the recollection of the barbarian nobility who once inhabited them. No, sir; if war does come, (which may God in his mercy avert,) it will be upon water; the fate of empire will there be decided. Your armies upon land will be of little or no service. Under the great changes in modern times, the true system of defense and power is to take advantage of all the inventions and improvements (particularly in steam) of the day, and give such efficiency to your navy as will enable us to meet any contingency that may arise. I confess that I am proud of being the supporter of that glorious and noble arm of our national defense. It has borne our stars and our stripes in honor to the most distant seas of the habitable globe; and the votaries of freedom in every land have been cheered by the broad folds of our national banner, as it has swept along the remotest coasts of this earth.

But, sir, it has been said that appropriations on this subject have heretofore been sectional; that, while we have not received our share, others have received more than their share. Sir, to a certain extent this has been true; but I contend that expenditures on this branch, more than everything else connected with Government, have shed a common benefit and a common blessing upon our united country. What can protect the immense productions of the South, floating over every sea to foreign lands, as they do, but a vigilant and efficient navy? If the ships are made at the North, and if they are manned by northern men, (but we have our full proportion of officers,) yet if they protect and defend our rich productions from the plunder and oppression of foreign Powers, we have a deep stake in supporting them. It is the only branch of public defense and public expenditure in which we have a peculiar and deep interest. And allow me to say, that this is no time for a Representative from an Atlantic or Gulf State to hesitate in voting appropriations that may be proper to put our navy in spanning order. Look at the movements of the French in the Gulf and on the coast of Mexico. Without pretending to censure them, or at present to question their rights, yet I will say that their position upon a defenseless coast, and amongst rich and defenseless islands, is tempting to their power; and if they withstand it they have less ambition than the world attributes to them. Sir, what I mean to insinuate is, that in the progress of events such a point may be occupied, and such a position assumed, that the independence of our commerce from the Mississippi valley and through the Gulf may be rendered doubtful in the future. And if such should be the case, I do not hesitate to say it might raise the question of peace or war.

The independence of ten of the richest States of this Union rests upon the freedom of the Gulf commerce being placed beyond the possible reach of any foreign Power. Is this the time for us to stint appropriations for anything connected with your navy? Sir, I abhor that cruel economy, which, to save a few thousand dollars now, would sacrifice the blood of freemen hereafter.

I am in favor of the appropriation for Pensacola, too, because I believe efficient protection and support to our navy on that extensive coast, its remote position, and the sparse population bordering upon the Gulf of Mexico, all demand from this Government its guardian care and military protection. I believe, also, that all the States in the valley of the Mississippi and the Ohio are deeply interested in sustaining the power and efficiency of our navy in the Gulf, particularly at this juncture of affairs in that quarter. I go for appropriations of this kind, not because they may be of local benefit to this section or that section, but because of their common benefit to my common country. True, our finances may be low, and let us go for an enlightened retrenchment and economy. Yes, sir, strike at your light-houses and harbor bills—your Cumberland road bill—your new fortification bills—and all such like loose and unnecessary appropriations. But, in God's name, do not strike at the navy, the pride and the ornament of the country; and particularly at this period of the world, when every other maritime Power seems to be concentrating their national energies upon that arm of defense.

Mark the progress of these things, and I predict, when you refuse such appropriations as this, that in the last three days of this very session, the 16th joint rule of this House will be suspended, in order to let in bills embracing all kinds of appropriations, which singly and alone, upon their own independent merits, could never receive the sanction of the majority of this House, upon full or fair discussion.

I will here say that I cannot agree to the proposition, or, as it has been called, a bargain, proposed by the gentleman from New York, [MR. HOFFMAN,] in relation to the Philadelphia dock. It is due to candor to say that I am opposed to that amendment. I do not think it at all needed, if the one at New York is established. The sentiments I have now avowed are the same I have uttered here before, four years since. I am opposed, generally, to appropriations upon land, or for land service, but in favor of strengthening our national defense upon water.

MR. PETRIKIN rose amidst cries of "Question!" "Question!" The gentleman from South Carolina [MR. PICKENS] said he had voted for the Cumberland road. It was true that he had; and he believed, at the time, it was right, and that he was voting for the general good. He had done it partly on grounds of expediency, because the Government was under a pledge; but he found he had been deceived. He had been in the wrong; he had found this out in a very few days after his vote had been given; but if God and his constituents would forgive him for this once, he never would vote another dollar in the same way as long as he lived.

MR. STANLY. I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, to enter into this discussion. Although I feel some interest that the amendment offered should meet with favorable consideration, I have waited for my colleague, who is more immediately interested in the establishment of a navy-yard at the place alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, [MR. WISE.] If it should be in order, during this debate, and if there is the slightest ground for hope that the proposition can succeed, I shall move to amend the bill by making an appropriation for a navy-yard at Beaufort, North Carolina.

Dry Docks—Mr. Thompson.

HO. OF REPS.

My principal object is to call attention to the confessions of my colleague, [Mr. C. SHEPARD,] who is now emphatically "on the other side." He said, sir, among other things, that when appropriations were made for the North, all parties went "in mass, in solid column." Now, sir, the politicians in my part of the world, who belong to the Administration, charge the Whigs with all the extravagant expenditures. I hope that charge will no longer be made, as one of their own party now confesses the contrary.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I heard other remarks from my colleague, which I must be allowed to say, are in bad taste from a member of Congress from North Carolina. They sound strangely in my ears, coming from my colleague, who has heretofore, I thought, entertained more liberal views. I disapprove of this eternal thundering, on this floor, from certain southern members, against what they are pleased to call the "miserable local appropriations" of one section. We have other causes which, if not removed, must inevitably tend to array one portion of the Confederacy against the other. It may be, and probably is, true that our northern brethren are more attentive to their interests than we are; that they understand better than we what Sam Slick calls "ciphering;" but, sir, let us do them justice upon this subject of appropriating money. As far as my experience goes, I have never known any northern man oppose an appropriation for the southern country, because it was the southern country. Unquestionably, too, millions of public money may have been wasted in building harbors, clearing out creeks, and improving streams, which nature never intended to be navigable. Much of this has been done in the last eight years. A large portion of this may have been spent at the North; but why was it spent there? Why have we of the South had so little public money expended for our advantage? My colleague knows the reason. It has been the policy of many of our "economical Democrats," as they call themselves, not only to refuse to ask for, to demand, any appropriations, but to refuse to take them when they were offered. If we please, we can admire the consistency of this class of politicians, who, no doubt, were honest in the constitutional opinions they entertained in declining to allow the General Government to make improvements within their States. But then it comes with an ill grace from us to censure others for the consequences of our own conduct.

Mr. Chairman, I am a southern man. I thank my God that I am. Next to learning the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments, I was taught to venerate the character, protect the interests, and defend the honor of North Carolina. I still cherish the recollections of these early lessons. They "grow with my growth, and strengthen with my strength." And, sir, I regard it as a duty I owe to my State and my country to avoid creating sectional feelings. In doing so, we forget the advice of the Father of his Country, and the dignity which becomes the representatives of sovereign States.

The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] who has just taken his seat, habitually indulges in declamation of this kind. He has just put forth a shower of denunciatory epithets against what he calls "miserable local appropriations." I would ask the gentleman what kind of appropriations he sanctions. If I am not mistaken, we made an appropriation last session for some work near Charleston. This was sustained, and properly, by the arguments of gentlemen from that State. Does he call this "local appropriation?" And what appropriations will that gentleman approve of if he objects to local appropriations?

I regret, sir, to have been forced to object to the opinions of my colleague. But I have been unaccustomed to hearing from North Carolina the avowal of feelings and opinions which inevitably tend to alienate one portion of our country from the other.

Mr. THOMPSON said that there could be no more just exponent of the times we live in, and the mode of doing business in this body, than the extreme anxiety of gentlemen to rush this bill through the House after an hour's discussion, and with an almost total ignorance of every important fact involved. We are asked to make a beginning in an appropriation which will require two millions to complete the work, without estimates of any sort, without any reasons showing its necessity, or, if necessary at all, that the points proposed are the most advantageous. Why this "indecent haste" to expend millions, and what makes it worse, with a bankrupt Treasury? He had not offered his amendment for the paltry purpose of defeating the measure. He disdained to resort to such tricks. But he believed, nay, he did not hesitate to say that he would prove, beyond the possibility of refutation, that the interests of the country demanded a dry-dock at Pensacola more than at New York and Philadelphia both put together. What, sir, is the chief use of a dry-dock? Not for building, but for repairing vessels. We have now a dry-dock at Norfolk and one at Boston, and it is proposed to have another at New York, to which he did not object. But what earthly use can there be for another at Philadelphia, when there is one on either side of that place within one hundred miles? Is not that enough, in all conscience, and more especially when there is not, from the capes of the Chesapeake to the Sabine, a single point at which even a long-boat can be repaired? As to building ships, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] tells you that the largest ship ever built in America, the Pennsylvania, was built at Philadelphia, as a proof of the ship-building capabilities of that place, and as an argument for the establishment of a dry-dock there. To his mind (Mr. T. said) it proved precisely the reverse of the latter proposition. If such a ship as the Pennsylvania was built without a dry-dock, it was the most conclusive proof that one was not necessary for the employment of the ship-building talents of Philadelphia. A dry-dock is not needed for building ships; and surely, when there are two within a hundred miles of Philadelphia, another is not needed for repairing them. But at Pensacola the case is different, for the slightest injury to a ship on the southern Atlantic coast, or on the Gulf, cannot be repaired nearer than Norfolk. This in time of peace; but, in the event of war, what would be our condition? Why, sir, that, at the very point which must inevitably be the seat of that war, and where our ships must be required, there is no place to repair them in fifteen hundred miles. Naval stations for repairing vessels should be located where they are most likely to be required. Where, for example, are the dry-docks of France? Not at Bordeaux, the great commercial metropolis, but at Brest, Toulon, and Cherbourg. Where are those of England? Not at Liverpool or London, but at Portsmouth and Chatham.

At what point would an enemy be most apt to strike? Most certainly at the Gulf of Mexico. If for no other reason, because the possession of the debouch of the Mississippi would give the command of the commerce of five sixths of the Union—more important than the possession of New York and Philadelphia both. And where else but in the West Indies (in that immediate neighborhood) can any foreign nation congregate their fleets previous to an attack? Besides, the immense value of the commerce of those islands makes that the most important theater of naval conflicts. With a view to these most important considerations he would say that, cost what it might, Pensacola, or some other point on the gulf, should be made an important naval station. If nature had not done all that was necessary, let art assist at whatever cost. But is such the case? No, sir; far from it. He did not hesitate to say that no place on our whole coast presented such advantages; and that in favor of no single point was there such an accumulation of testimony as that which exists as to Pensacola. A late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Southard, with that enlarged and enlightened patriotism which has illustrated his whole public life, long since urged this subject upon Congress. He says in a report to Congress: "The whole country from the Alleghany to the Gulf, is interested in the establishment of a naval station at Pensacola. With whatever nation we may be at war, the principal theater will be the Gulf of Mexico, and the object of attack the commerce of the Mississippi."

The board of engineers, with the undivided authority of that body, say, "situated as Pensacola is, with respect to the country on either hand, the immense regions behind it, its rare properties as a harbor become of inappreciable value. First. It is accessible to the largest class of sloops and frigates. Second. Its bar is near the coast. Third. It is perfectly land locked. Fourth. It has excellent facilities for building, repairing, and launching, and for docks and dock-yards. Fifth. Abundance of good water. Sixth. It is perfectly defensible." Commodore Dallas says: "The bar is twenty-three feet at low water, and only twenty-seven is required for the largest ships. There will be no difficulty in deepening to any required extent. But to the seven depth of feet nothing can be more practicable." Commodore Ridgely uses almost the very same language, to which is added the testimony of Rogers, Bainbridge, Warrington, Kearney, Biddle, Woolsey, Ballard, Clarkson, Slidell—of almost every officer who has given glory to our Navy, and of one of a very different sort, the illustrious hero of Charleston harbor. Every officer of both the land and the naval service, without one exception, concurs in its importance as a station, as well as the perfect practicability of making it one. Why will gentlemen then continue to say, give us information and we will vote the appropriation? What do they want? What can be added to what we already have? What else can be furnished? Do gentlemen, not relying upon the opinion of these able men, skilled in this department, desire the data upon which to judge themselves? Let them look into the reports of the late Secretary Southard, and of the various naval officers who have been on that station, and they will find them. They will find a bar now twenty-three feet deep, at low water, and, what is of more consequence, a bar that has not changed half an inch in one hundred and twenty years. By a survey made by the French Government in 1720, the depth is precisely what it now is. A cannon sunk on the bar thirty years ago has been recently found not in the slightest degree imbedded. The bar is now deep enough for all vessels except of the very largest size, and may be, with perfect ease, dredged to any required depth—to sixty feet, if needed.

The valley of the Mississippi, too, furnishes every single article that is needed in ship-building, iron, copper, lead, zinc, hemp, live-oak, everything necessary in ship-building—and, I might add, everything (in the remarkable language of Talleyrand to Bonaparte, when remonstrating against the cession of Louisiana) that is needed by civilized man. And are we to be told that these materials for ship-building must all be sent round to northern navy-yards, to be worked up by northern mechanics, and not only that, but we are to have no naval station on our whole extended southern and Gulf coast, no place in time of war for a naval station; none in less than fifteen hundred miles, where the ships, so absolutely necessary for our protection, may be repaired? And this, too, is refused us at the very moment that gentlemen ask us to add two more to the dry-docks already accessible in the North. That Philadelphia, with two already within a hundred miles, is too remote; but that fifteen hundred miles is not too far for southern fleets to be taken for repairs? In 1825, the President was directed to purchase a site, erect buildings, and establish a naval station at Pensacola. Has anything effectual, as yet, been done? In 1836, by collecting together a set of the most revolting facts, showing the grossest neglect, not only of southern, but of national interests, I wrung from the House a small appropriation for these great objects; yet scarcely any of that small appropriation has, as yet, been expended. Am I, sir, (said Mr. T.,) are the people of the South, to be silenced by the miserable excuse that there was some dispute about the title to the ground owned by the Government? Why has not that title been quieted by compromise or otherwise? Or why has not some new site been selected? If the people of the South and West submit to these things, they deserve no better. Mr. T. did not hold the present head of the Navy Department responsible for those things. It would be unjust to charge that gentleman with any want of a just regard to the interests of the South. And, sir, am I to be taken up and lectured here, not only by northern but by southern men, too, as involving improperly sectional topics, because I allude to these things? I should be recreant to the South and its interests if I forbore to do so from any sickly and mawkish sentimentality, or the poor vanity of making fine sentences about our glorious Union, and that broad patriotism that looks to the interest of the whole country, disregarding all sectional injustice, however gross. If this be narrow and sectional, be it so. Let gentlemen make the most of it, and pursue, if they choose, a different course. That they will gain much reputation for a large and enlightened patriotism elsewhere than at home, I do not doubt. Whether they will promote the interests of their constituents or the country is another question. I know the generous and confiding nature of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY.] Conscious of a superiority to all narrow feelings, he suspects none in others. Let him stay here as long as I have, and I rather think he will find these notions going out at the palms of his hands.

But my friend from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] has first brought up this topic, and repeats indorsing some remarks at the last session by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS.] That distinguished gentleman, in reply to some remarks of mine made two years before as to the inequality of disbursements, with the trick, or rather I should say the skill (as that is more respectful) of a practiced dialectician, relied upon the fact that the largest amount of the public money on deposit was in the southern States. There was much more of wit than truth in the views which he presented. What was my position? That much the largest amount of appropriations went North. How does he reply to it? Why, by showing that whilst on deposit, between the time of collection and disbursement, large sums were found in the South. For example, Alabama paid to the Government, in 1834, about $1,250,000, and received back in appropriations $250,000; whilst Vermont, which paid $179, received $185,000; Mississippi and Louisiana paid $1,000,000 each, and each received in appropriations less than $250,000; whilst New Hampshire paid $16,000, and received $334,000. But while this money was in transit from these southern States, which it depleted to skeletons, to these northern States, which it fed to repletion and plethora, it did stop a little while in southern banks until it could be removed to its ultimate and legitimate home in the North. Our own money abided with us three months, "three little months," and that is made an item of charge against us.

But, says the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] there is the Florida war, and its large appropriations. Indeed, and has it come to that? Are we to be charged, as for a sectional purpose, with money expended in defending our wives and children from the savage tomahawk? Most beneficent Government! most generous and magnanimous people! who are capable of the unexampled generosity of appropriating money for these purposes! Why, sir, that is the single benefit that we of the South receive from this connection—and that is enjoyed in at least an equal degree by the North—united strength and mutual aid in war; a great matter, it is true, but not to be put down as of a sectional character. But, sir, if the gentleman's constituents have given us money to carry on this war, I believe it is all they have given. I have heard of no volunteers from that quarter. I wonder what has become of that gallant regiment of New York, which, on a late memorable occasion, tendered its services to General Jackson to go and cut the throats of the Nullifiers! I remember it well, for I was alarmed no little. It was a great crisis everywhere, but especially with us; and when every heart, rightly attuned, beat fervently for the peace of the country, and prayed that the bitter cup might pass from us; when good men and patriots sought more the olive branch than the bayonet; when that olive branch was magnanimously and generously tendered, and in the same spirit received, this gallant regiment thought only of the spirit-stirring drum and the strife of battle. What has become of those gallant fellows? Dead, I suppose, sir, all dead, or surely their trenchant blades would have leaped from their scabbards at the first note of this Florida war; all dead, I suppose—killed in foreign wars, no doubt, in Texas, or perhaps in the civil wars of Spain, as it seems to be a civil broil for which they have a special fancy.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the committee then rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

GRADUATION BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

January 2, 1839.

The Senate took up for consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for the reduction and graduation of the price of the Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, had offered a resolution to refer the bill back to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to that committee so to amend it as to restrict its benefits to actual settlers.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, deemed it only necessary to remark, on this occasion, that the bill was now in the same shape as that in which it passed the Senate at the last session. The bill had, in its original shape, provided for a further reduction to fifty cents per acre, but that clause having been stricken out, the lowest reduction was now seventy-five cents, extending to lands that had been offered for fifteen years and upwards. The bill contained no new principle—it was well understood; and was regarded as a measure of justice by the new States, who asked it of the National Legislature, principally, on that ground. With these observations, he would content himself with submitting the measure to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. NILES offered an amendment to strike out all after the proviso in the 12th line; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, was sure that the Senate would agree with him in thinking that this bill was one of great importance, and that the most deliberate consideration should be bestowed on it before taking the vote. He was aware that the Senate, at the last session, passed a bill somewhat like this, containing its essential provisions. But the Senate was then constituted somewhat differently from what it now was. Many members might have changed their opinions; and the country itself, judging from an expression of opinion by a large and respectable portion of it in one of the southern States, was getting more alive to the importance of this great portion of our national wealth. He did hope, therefore, that this important question would not be hurried through without a thorough discussion. He had so recently addressed the Senate on this subject, that he should, with extreme reluctance, again engage in the discussion; but the magnitude of the interests involved would not permit him to continue silent. The bill, as it now stands, operated on seventy-one millions of acres of public land, as large as two of the States of this Union, and which, under its provisions, were almost instantaneously to be reduced in price from $1 25 to 75 cents. The difference in point of value of these lands, between the prices under the existing law and those they would be reduced to under the operations of this bill, was $35,000,000. Now, a sum of this magnitude, at any time, and especially at a moment when the Government was pressed for want of revenue—when gentlemen on all sides of the House seemed to think it their duty to retrench—ought not to be voted away without the most imperative considerations. It was not his purpose at this moment to offer all the considerations which pressed upon him; he had risen only for the purpose of making a motion, to which he invited the serious attention of the Senate. It was not necessary for him to repeat that he was radically opposed to any change of the land system, and the motion he was compelled to make was to limit the waste of this public treasure. The motion was to confer the right to purchase public lands at a reduced price upon actual settlers, to exclude speculation, which he believed would be the inevitable consequence of this immense reduction. At the very moment (said Mr. C.) that we are casting from us this valuable treasure, immense fortunes are making by individuals, who are purchasing these lands at the minimum price, and selling them at a large profit to actual settlers. He believed that if the sales had been confined to actual settlers, the population of the new States would have increased much more rapidly than it had done. His object was to confine the boon to actual settlers only; and with this view he offered his present motion, and asked for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. C. then moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to amend it so as to restrict the sales at a reduced price to actual settlers only, and to limit each sale in quantity to one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. WALKER said the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has given us no reason to suppose that if the bill were recommitted and amended, as he proposes, by limiting the sales to actual settlers at the reduced prices, he would then support the measure. Mr. W. would now inquire, would the Senator from Kentucky support the bill if his amendment were adopted? The Senator from Kentucky would not and could not answer in the affirmative; he had always opposed graduation in every form, and he (Mr. W.) had no doubt would continue to oppose it. The amendment, then, was not offered to aid the passage of the bill, but by one who would oppose the measure, however amended or modified. And, now, is it not most extraordinary that the Senator from Kentucky should be found proposing this limitation of the sales at the reduced prices to actual settlers—a measure which he had denounced as odious, unjust, and unconstitutional. Had the Senator forgotten his course on this subject in 1836, 1837, and 1838? He had forgotten that when, in the spring of 1836, he (Mr. W.) had first introduced a bill confining the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, he [Mr. CLAY] had risen to prevent even the second reading of the bill. He denounced the limitation of the sales to actual settlers as a gross violation of the Constitution, and declared that the bill ought to be instantly rejected. At that session (Mr. W. said) he had been defeated, but the next year (1837) he brought forward the same measure. Again the Senator from Kentucky was its ardent and persevering opponent; but, nevertheless, the measure passed the Senate, but failed in the House. And now, is it not surprising, is not the Senator himself astonished, is not the Senate and country astounded to hear the Senator from Kentucky proposing to incorporate into this bill a principle which he has so recently and repeatedly denounced as unjust and unconstitutional? Ought not the Senator to have permitted a little more time to have elapsed before he astonished his friends and the country by this most extraordinary change of position. But, sir, it is a change of position only, not of principle. The Senator from Kentucky has not changed his principles; he is still the uncompromising opponent of the actual settler; he is only assailing from behind a breastwork the interest of the new States, and he will vote against the bill, whether his amendment is adopted or rejected. If it is otherwise, let the Senator from Kentucky now say, that with the amendment he will support the bill, and thus insure its passage in both Houses, and he (Mr. W.) would support the amendment. The bill, as it now stands, limits the right of entry at the reduced price to one section, thus preventing all danger of monopoly or speculation. The bill was confined to the lands that had been long in market, and which your official reports demonstrate, will not sell within any reasonable time, if ever, at the present price.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Graduation Bill—Mr. Clay, of Alabama.

SENATE

Many of these lands have been in market nearly half a century, and no one would give for them the minimum price per acre. Do you intend to hold on to them another half century, by demanding prices they will never bring, or do you intend never to change the price of these lands? Do you intend thus to condemn to perpetual desolation vast regions of the valley of the West, because, in the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky, as exhibited in his table, some portions of this great valley may be too rapidly augmenting in population. It has heretofore been considered by political economists, that that statesman was most wise, useful, and patriotic, who encouraged the cultivation of the soil of the country; but now this maxim seems to be reversed, and he is to be regarded as the most useful individual who will withhold from cultivation the largest portion of the soil of the country, by demanding prices for it which it will never bring—by holding on to it from century to century; losing by this wise scheme of finance, by interest alone, in every sixteen years, one half the limited price. But why move to recommit the bill? The bill was open to amendment without recommitment, and the Senator from Kentucky could now move his proposition, and take the sense of the Senate upon it, without sending the bill back to the committee. A recommitment could produce no other effect than to endanger the passage of the bill by the delay which it would occasion, one-third of the short session having already passed; and Mr. W. hoped that no friend of the bill, in any shape, would vote for the recommitment.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, expressed his surprise that this motion for recommitment, made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] had not been made at an earlier day. The bill under consideration, he said, as its number indicated, was the first one introduced at the present session. It had been introduced on his (Mr. C.'s) motion at the earliest possible moment. After having been twice read, it had been, in the usual course, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, by whom it had been reported, without the least delay, in form and substance, as it had passed the Senate at the last session. When the bill first came up for consideration, the honorable Senator from Kentucky rose, and said he had not expected it to come up at that time, and that, consequently, he was not then prepared for its discussion. He moved the postponement of its consideration till the following Monday, and his motion was sustained. In the mean time, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] availing himself of this delay, moved its reference to the Committee on Finance, with a view to have it considered, and reported upon in reference to the probable effect of its passage upon the revenue. That committee reported it back on the day appointed for its consideration, but other business occupied the attention of the Senate that day, and for several days afterwards, and, in the mean time, the report of the Committee on Finance was printed. The bill came up again a week ago; and what course did the Senator from Kentucky then think proper to pursue? He seemed to be then as much taken at surprise as in the first instance; he was not still ready for its discussion, and again moved its postponement, and it was further postponed till Monday last. The attention of the Senate was, however, occupied throughout that day with other subjects, and it had not come up until now.

Now, (said Mr. C.,) why did not the Senator from Kentucky offer his proposition for recommitment at one of those periods? He said all knew this was the short session, limited by the Constitution to the 3d day of March; and one third of the period allotted to it had elapsed. He asked, did not the course pursued have the appearance of a wish to defeat the bill, by procrastinating its passage to so late a period of the session that there would not be time left sufficient for the consideration and action of the other House? Could it be considered fair and honorable, in the enemies of the measure, thus to attempt to defeat it by indirection? Mr. C. said he would not charge this to be the intention of the Senator from Kentucky, but certainly that would be the effect, whatever might be the motive. The friends of the measure had full confidence in its merits, in its justice and its expediency; all they desired was that its opponents should meet it fairly. Let them bring forward whatever objections they believed to exist, and urge all their arguments against its principle or its policy; and its friends would undertake to meet all those objections and arguments. We only ask (said Mr. C.) time for investigation, and time for action; a dispassionate consideration, and a calm decision.

Sir, (said Mr. C.,) if there were anything novel in the measure before us, there would be some plausibility, and, perhaps, propriety, in seeking to delay its progress; but there is no new feature in it. As the bill now stands, it was not only fully debated, but passed the Senate by a decided majority at the last session, and within the last seven or eight months. Nor, indeed, (said Mr. C.,) was it then new. It had been a subject of deep and exciting interest, not only in the new States, where the lands embraced by its provisions lie, but throughout the Union, for the last twelve or fifteen years, but more especially during the last six or seven. Within the latter period, he said, it would be recollected, the bill for the distribution of the net proceeds of the public lands, amongst the several States, had been repeatedly agitated in both Houses of Congress. That measure had been just cause of alarm amongst the people of the new States, and had attracted the attention of all. It had been freely discussed everywhere; not only here, but in most of the State Legislatures, and in primary assemblies of the people. Then why recommit the bill, which must result in inevitable delay? Why not meet the question at once, and determine its fate in one way or the other—either favorably or adversely?

But, sir, for what purpose are we called upon to recommit the bill? For the purpose of so amending it as to restrict the sales to actual settlers, and in quantities not exceeding one quarter section; and this motion comes from the Senator from Kentucky. I confess, I heard his proposition with astonishment! It is surely a novel movement on his part. It is the first time we have ever heard his voice raised in favor of the occupant or pioneer. Why, sir, have we not, within less than twelve months, within these same walls, heard the Senator from Kentucky denouncing this worthy class of citizens as lawless intruders, trespassers, and violators of the law, utterly unworthy of any favor from the Government? What strange magic has wrought this change in that Senator's feelings towards those who were so recently destitute, in his opinion, of all meritorious claims? He asked for the evidence of the sincerity of the Senator from Kentucky in this extraordinary, unexpected, and questionable movement in their favor. His apparent zeal in behalf of the settlers might well be questioned, when his whole course, heretofore, had been that of unyielding opposition and unsparring denunciation.

Sir, I am not opposed, on this, or any other occasion, to giving the right of preemption to the occupant of this, or any other class of the public lands. It is true there is not the same inducement to extend such protection in reference to the lands embraced by this bill, as in the case of lands subject to sale at auction. The right of preemption was mainly intended to protect the humble settler against the overwhelming power of capitalists and speculators at public sales. At those sales the price was not limited, the highest bidder became the purchaser, and any man whose purse contained a few more dollars than that of the occupant, might oust him and his family from the possession and enjoyment of a tract made desirable and valuable by his labor and industry. The lands embraced by this bill are not subject to be sold at auction, but they are to be open to private entry, at fixed prices; and, however poor a man may be, if he can command one dollar or seventy-five cents per acre, he can compete with the most wealthy purchaser. Diligence and promptitude in his application will give the poorest man who can command the reduced price, the preference over the richest, who may be more tardy.

But, sir, there is no need of the proposed amendment to protect the occupants of these inferior lands; they are already entitled to the right of preemption till the 22d of June, 1840, under the provision of the preemption-law passed at the last session, and which the Senator from Kentucky opposed, in every stage, so vehemently. Every settler on public land subject to private entry, knows that, under the preemption law referred to, and the construction placed upon it by the Secretary of the Treasury, he has the undisputed right to enter it, in preference to all others, for the period of two years, from and after the passage of that act. The reduction of the price cannot affect this right. If a law were to pass reducing the price of all lands, whether subject to sale at auction or by private entry, every occupant would still retain his right of preemption at the reduced price. It is not, then, the preference proposed by the instructions, to be given to actual settlers, that constitutes the objection we entertain; it is the restriction of sales to settlers alone, and suffering no one who is not an occupant, though he may own adjoining lands, to which portions of these refuse lands may be a desirable addition on account of timber or pasture, or though he may be entirely destitute of a home for his family, to become a purchaser at the prices fixed by the bill.

Still, however, (said Mr. C.,) the recommitment of the bill is not necessary to the attainment of the object in view, even if a majority of the Senate should concur in the views of the Senator from Kentucky. Why not move the amendment here? The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to any amendment or modification, which may meet the views of a majority. Such an amendment can easily be drawn up, and now submitted, and decided. We are ready to meet the question; it is the delay, and the consequences of delay, to which we object. Our enemies may attain one object, by the defeat of the bill under consideration. It may continue to retard the growth and prosperity of the States west of the Alleghany Mountains, and, consequently, lessen their political importance. He said, keeping up the prices of those inferior lands would compel thousands of the humble class to remain in the older States, either in your crowded cities, or force them to go into your great manufacturing establishments, to obtain the means of a scanty subsistence. Mr. C. alluded to the view heretofore urged by him, and maintained that the laboring poor, on this side of the mountains, as well as on the other, were interested alike in the success of this measure. He urged, in substance, that, by reducing the price of these refuse lands to their fair relative value, it would be placed in the power of the humble cultivator of the old States, to obtain a home which he could call his own, and, by honest industry, rear his family in comfort and independence. The bill, he said, was not confined in its operation to special localities; but, if passed, its benefits would be diffused throughout our country.

But, sir, the Senator from Kentucky denounces the bill as tending to encourage monopoly. And what is this frightful monopoly, against which the Senator, for the first time, raises his warning voice? Under its provisions, no one individual can enter a quantity exceeding six hundred and forty acres; yet the Senator would alarm us by the portentous cry of monopoly—a monopoly of six hundred and forty acres of refuse land—of land, much of which has been twenty years, or upwards, in market, and cannot be sold for the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre! Much of this land was of the third, fourth, or even fifth quality, situated in the oldest parts of the new States, and interspersed through the most dense and populous districts, attended by every facility for knowing its value, or making settlements upon it; yet it would not command, because nobody thought it worth, the minimum price. Is the purchase of a section of such land as this a monopoly, with which we, or the people of this country can be frightened? Mr. C. said he would be rejoiced to hear the honorable Senator's distinguished eloquence employed in denouncing other monopolies which, in his opinion, ought to be regarded as really enormous, and dangerous to the liberties of the country. He said it was under the auction system, assisted by our expanded bank-paper system, that the public lands had been monopolized. It was not the object of the friends of the bill to encourage speculation in any part of the public domain. Our object, said he, is to bring these lands into market at a price proportionate to their value—at a price which will induce purchasers to enter them for cultivation—to fill up the population of the new States—to develop their resources, and mature their strength.

Graduation Bill—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

Would the Senator from Kentucky (asked Mr. C.) cut off those who may own adjoining lands, from the privilege of entering a limited quantity to complete their settlements? He said many individuals, poor, as well as rich, had purchased and settled on tracts not more than sufficient for cultivation; would it be fair or just to deny them the privilege of extending those tracts, by adding others at the graduated prices, to supply them with timber and pasture lands? This class would not purchase for speculation, yet they would be wholly denied the benefits of the act, if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky prevailed.

Sir, we learn from the documents on our tables, that there were about seventy-one millions of acres, which have been subject to entry five years, and upwards, on the 30th September, 1837; and the Senator from Kentucky exclaims, in reference to this quantity, that the bill will operate on land enough to make two large States; and that it will make a difference of $35,000,000, in the amount of money to be obtained for it! Now, sir, is this a fair mode of treating the subject? Why, sir, we all know, or ought to know, that it is shown by the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made in January last, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, that the general average price, under the entire cash system, (which began in July, 1820,) was only $1 27 4-5 cents per acre. The same document tells us that the average price of all the land, sold in 1828 and 1829, each, was only $1 26 per acre—one cent gross above the minimum. We all know, too, that the much-abused preemption laws had nothing to do with producing this result. No general preemption law was then in existence, or ever had existed before; the first general preemption law having passed on the 29th May, 1830. Such are the facts in regard to the prices obtained for your most fertile and valuable lands, as shown by undeniable evidence derived from the most authentic source. Yet the Senator from Kentucky declares that the bill, which only proposes a reduction to seventy-five cents per acre, will make a difference in the receipts from these refuse lands, equal to $35,000,000.

Sir, here is an assumption that the lands embraced by the bill would command as much as the best lands which have been sold by the Government under the cash system. Can any one seriously entertain this opinion? Why, sir, 14,276,156 acres of this land had been in market, and subject to private entry, at the minimum price of $1 25, for twenty years and upwards; on the 30th of September last, 21,929,673 acres of it had then been in market from fifteen years to twenty years, and remained unsold at the minimum; 16,280,673 acres had then been in market from ten to fifteen years, and remained unsold, at the minimum; and 18,517,802 acres had then been in market from five to ten years, and remained unsold at the minimum. Is it fair, then, to assume that this immense quantity of refuse land, embracing barren mountains and sterile pine barrens, will ever command the Government price? No, sir; much of it never will command any price, and the one half, nay the one third, would not sell at the present minimum in twenty years. If it would, it is better for the Government to receive seventy-five cents per acre now. If we compute the interest on that price, even for twelve years, we shall find it equal to the reduction of fifty cents per acre, the lowest contemplated by this bill.

Sir, it is due to the future strength, resources, and prosperity of the new States that these lands should become the property of individuals. The law does not prevent the use of the timber which is upon them; it may be cut down and carried off with impunity. Transient settlers may go upon them, cultivate them for a season, and remove to others. Having no permanent interest in the soil, they will cultivate it without regard to its preservation. In this manner it will be stripped of timber, worn out, and exhausted, and deprived of all its value to this Government or to the States. The new States will thus be denied the benefit of the increase of population to which they are entitled, and have their resources and productions diminished and crippled. Even now, much of this refuse land is daily deteriorating in value. It is our interest that every stick of timber not absolutely necessary for present use should be preserved, and that every acre of land should be profitably and judiciously cultivated.

But, sir, as I have heretofore contended, the United States are bound, in good faith, to reduce the price of inferior lands till they will sell. Can it be regarded within the terms of the compact under which the new States were admitted, that those lands are never to be sold, unless they will command $1 25 per acre, or any other given price? By no means, according to his understanding. The new States were required to disclaim all right and title to the waste and unappropriated lands within their limits, and that the same should remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and, moreover, that every tract of land sold by the United States, after the admission of such new States, should be exempt from taxation of every sort for the term of five years from the date of such sale. These, with the right to tax the lands of the United States within their limits, and various other rights of sovereignty, were required to be surrendered; but the terms speak of, and contemplate a sale by, the United States; they clearly imply an obligation to sell. Then, is it a fulfillment of that obligation to refuse to sell those lands for a price equal to their value—to refuse to sell them for what they are worth? Certainly not. If the obligation could be discharged by fixing a price, it might be done by establishing five or ten dollars as the minimum. This could not be regarded, however, as a performance of the compact in good faith, for the lands would not sell at all; it would be tantamount to declaring that none of this land should thereafter be sold, which all would pronounce a palpable and flagrant breach of faith. Sir, the only way for this Government to perform its obligation in good faith is, to offer those lands at their fair relative value; such as are of any value will then sell; but to hold all the different qualities at one fixed price is just as absurd as to require the same price for all domestic animals of the same species, or to hold all fabrics, manufactured of the same material, whether fine or coarse, to be of equal value.

Mr. C. said, as a financial measure, also, the bill was now entitled to the favorable consideration of the Senate. It would be recollected (he said) that the bill had been, on the motion of his honorable friend from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] referred to the Committee on Finance, to consider and report upon its probable effects upon the receipts of the Treasury. The result (he said) was known; the report of that committee, sustained by the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, was upon our tables, and established that its operation would be altogether favorable. It would enhance the receipts of the Treasury, when those derived from other sources were not only limited at present, but diminishing every year, under the operation of the compromise tariff law. Without the aid of this measure, it was apparent (he said) that we should be compelled to resort to other loans to sustain the Government. He asked, could it be sound policy to borrow money at any rate of interest, rather than supply the wants of the Treasury by a sale of these inferior lands at a fair price?

Taking the measure in every point of view, under the provisions of the several compacts, in reference to the claims of the new States, or the obligations of this Government in reference to the interests of the new States, or those of the Union, it was of beneficial tendency. He did not desire to consume more of the time of the Senate; indeed, he had not intended to consume any portion of it on this occasion, as the bill had not changed in its provision since the last session, when it had undergone a thorough discussion, and was passed by a decided majority. He had hoped, and somewhat expected, it would have passed at the present session by a silent vote. Nor could he now suppose—as no new objection had been stated, and no new argument against its justice or expediency had been presented, which had not before been considered—that the vote of any honorable Senator would be changed. Mr. C. confidently anticipated its passage now, by a majority as large as that by which it had passed at the last session.

Mr. BENTON was glad that the motion had been made—that was to say, coming from the quarter it did; and the yeas and nays having been ordered on it, would, after having been taken, do away every objection to the new preemption law which would be brought forward at the next session. It would do away all objections as to the constitutionality and justice of the measure, in giving a preference to one class of citizens over another, while it would also be an abandonment of all objections that had been taken to the character of the settlers. And again: he would say with a great deal of sincerity, that he rejoiced at the motion having been made, coming from the quarter it did, and that the yeas and nays had been ordered on it, as he should expect at the next session every year recorded in favor of this motion to be recorded also in favor of a preemption law. So much for the good of this motion; now for the evil of it. The farmers who are cultivating their farms in all the new States, from the borders of the northern lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, would be cut off by this amendment from the right of acquiring from the refuse lands at the reduced prices, which lie contiguous to their farms, such additions to them as they need, for the various supplies of wood, water, quarries of stone, pasturage, outlet for stock, &c., as well as for making a provision for their children. Now, how many of this class of persons were to be cut off? The old settlers who had been in the new States these ten and twenty years, who had made roads and built mills and churches, and had, by these means, made these refuse lands of some value, were to be cut off from the benefits of this bill. Yes, sir, by these means the entire population of the new States were to be cut off—to be outlawed, so far as the acquisition of the public domain is concerned—cut off from the rights which they now enjoy by the laws of the land, of acquiring a small portion of the refuse land contiguous to their farms, and which may be essential for the perfection of their improvements. Are we asked to inflict this injury on four or five millions of people? Were they not even to be allowed to acquire the waste land contiguous to them, even to keep off a bad neighbor? No, he felt the utmost confidence in referring this matter to the Senate, that no such species of outlawry would be enacted against half a million of heads of families in the West. What argument was offered in favor of it? Why, forsooth, to prevent speculations, as if the bill, as it now stood, did not limit the acquisition at the graduated price to six hundred and forty acres, and that, too, to be gathered up in different parcels? If six hundred and forty acres of land, which has been left without a purchaser for five or ten or fifteen or twenty years, and which would not be accepted as a gift from the sovereignties from whom we acquired this territory, are to be regarded as a speculation, and the people are to rush upon it, he apprehended that such a man as John Jacob Astor had proved himself to be by his conduct in business was not the man to engage in such speculations. He apprehended that the fifty years Mr. Astor had been engaged successfully in business, gave a sufficient contradiction to any such idea. The fears of the Senator from Kentucky were vain. Show me (said Mr. B.) the exception in the West where the man who extensively speculated in these lands did not become bankrupt; where even his own hereditary fortune was not eaten up by the continued losses, by taxes, by the infidelity of agents, and by a thousand other drawbacks to which such large speculators are inevitably subjected. Six hundred and forty acres to each purchaser was the quantity to which the bill now limited the sales, and we hear the loud appeal—the appeal forever made against touching the land system whenever any measure of the kind is brought forward to encourage the agricultural industry of the new States.

I utterly deny (said Mr. B.) that we are touching the land system. I utterly deny that we are touching any part of the system of surveying, or of giving title to the public lands. It is the price alone that is to be touched, and that has been operated on from the commencement of the Government to this time. The system was to continue the same, and the price of the refused lands alone was to be affected. Speculation! speculation! This is the raw-head and bloody-bones forever held up. Happily, we have got some examples to give, and happily the system of graduation has been tried—tried in the most delightful part of the United States—tried on an extensive scale, and with the most happy results. In all that part of the State of Mississippi acquired by treaty from the Chickasaw Indians, the system was established by the Indians themselves, and experience had shown that it had operated in the most beneficial manner, both for the Indians and for the State. These lands were to be sold by the Indians for their own benefit.

Graduation Bill—Mr. Benton, Mr. Clay, of Kentucky.

SENATE.

Mr. B. here read from the treaty of 1831 with the Choctaws, the scale of graduation, as follows: "The lands, as surveyed, shall be offered at public sale, at a price not less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; and thereafter for one year, those which are unsold, and which shall have been previously offered at public sale, shall be liable to private entry and sale at that price. Thereafter, and for one year longer, they shall be subject to entry and private sale at one dollar per acre. Thereafter, and during the third year, they shall be subject to sale and entry at fifty cents per acre. Thereafter, and during the fourth year, at twenty-five cents per acre; and afterwards at twelve and a half cents per acre."

And moreover these Indians had provided for the abandonment of their refuse lands after four years, while the United States have been hanging on to these lands, which were subject to gratuitous gift by the Spanish Government. And now what was the effect of this system? The objection made to this bill is that nobody will buy the lands at the present minimum price because they will prefer to wait until the next year, when they will come down to the first graduation of one dollar, and then that nobody will buy at the graduated price of one dollar, because they will prefer waiting another year for them to come down to the lowest price of seventy-five cents. By this argument, futile and weak as it was, and which no one ever gave a moment's consideration to, nobody would buy the Chickasaw lands till they fell to twelve and a half cents. Such an argument was contradicted by reason and experience. Who ever believed that a man would risk the loss of the lands he wanted by waiting a whole year for the sake of saving twenty-five or fifty cents an acre? Mr. B. then went on to show the progress of the sales made of the Chickasaw lands, by which it appeared that at three different prices they sold much faster than the lands of the United States. The sales were now going on rapidly at fifty cents, without waiting till the next year, when they would be at twenty-five cents. In short (said Mr. B.) all the land that was worth $1 25 sold at that price, without the purchasers waiting another year for it to fall. All the land that was worth one dollar, also sold at that price, without waiting for it to fall to fifty cents; and so, also, was the case with the land that was worth fifty and twenty-five cents. Now did not this show the wisdom of these Chickasaws? and ought we not to profit by their example and experience? Are we not daily taunted with the wants of the Treasury? Have we not been compelled to issue Treasury notes, which are, so far as creditors are concerned, nothing but a forced loan? Can we not (said he) avail ourselves of the wisdom of these Chickasaws, and sell our refuse lands for what they are worth, and by this means replenish our exhausted Treasury? It was in this view that the Committee on Finance had made a report, recommending the passage of this bill as a revenue measure, and he deemed it fortunate for the country that they had these refuse lands. Mr. B. referred to the operations of the compromise bill, and the rate at which it was bringing down the receipts from the customs. And what, he asked, had the scheme for preventing the sales of the refuse lands for its object? It was to cripple the Treasury, so that by the year 1842, when the compromise bill had been worked out, there would be a triumphant argument in favor of an increase of the tariff. We are for supplying the wants of the Treasury from the proceeds of these waste lands, thereby preventing the necessity of recurring again to a high tariff. What did the gentlemen propose, who wish to prevent us from selling these lands? Did they mean that the Treasury shall go down to ten or twelve millions, and make this the first step in the march in the return to the old tariff? He considered this movement as step number one, in the system heretofore to be developed for the revival of the tariff, and he wished all those gentlemen who come from that quarter of the Union, which for all the purposes of exaction, is the Asia of America, and where the great land holders are not nabobs, but the Zemindars, who merely hold the title to the land, but yield up the proceeds to lords paramount. Upon our conduct with regard to these lands depends what will be their conduct with regard to the unjust duties. The Treasury will be thrown upon the cotton, the rice, and the tobacco of the South; and he asked the gentlemen who came from that portion of the country which grows these products, to consider well what they do, when they come to record their votes.

This question presented itself in several aspects, several of which he had briefly touched on; another view of the subject was, that it was but an act of mere justice to the new States that the refuse lands lying in them should be converted into private property, that they may be subject to taxation, and thus contribute to the support of the State governments, instead of their being, as now, under the barren scepter of the Federal Government. Here were seventy-one millions of acres, enough, if united, to form two new States, and yet the States, in which it is dispersed, are not allowed to tax them. Was not this an act of injustice to the new States, and in violation of the compact entered into with them? Was it not plainly, in the fair construction of the compact, that these lands were to be sold, and not held up by keeping on them an arbitrary price, for all of them, good, bad, and indifferent? Was it not, in the fair construction of the compact, that the Federal Government shall sell these lands, and, in order to sell them, must they not offer them at a price at which they will sell? The new States were unjustly treated, in being obliged to lose the amount they ought to be receiving from the taxation of them, without taking into consideration the great loss to their agricultural industry, by keeping them waste and unproductive.

Mr. B. referred to the emigration to Missouri. The largest emigration that had ever taken place to his State, was that of the last year; and all the emigrants went on to the new lands, where they could get first choices at $1 25 per acre, because they could not give that sum for picked-over lands in the old counties.

Mr. B., after describing the manner in which very small portions of good land is mixed up with large portions of indifferent land in the old counties, recapitulated his argument in favor of selling these waste lands for the supply of the Treasury, in order to avoid a recurrence to a high tariff, loans, or, what was worse, to a new issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, would make a few remarks in reply to the Senators from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] and from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] From the course of the Senator from Alabama, in directing remarks against him personally, rather than to the subject before the Senate, it might be thought that he was actuated by some secret grief, some private animosity. He asks, why was this amendment not proposed at an earlier stage of this bill? Did it not occur to that Senator that this was the first opportunity that he (Mr. C.) had of presenting it? This bill was brought up suddenly and unexpectedly to him at the beginning of the session, and the Senate agreed to postpone it at his request. It again came up during the Christmas holidays, and was postponed until Monday last. At some personal inconvenience to myself I attended the Senate on that day, prepared to discuss the measure, but it was not called up by its friends; so that the Senate will see that this is the first opportunity which has been presented of offering the amendment. But the Senator from Alabama, not content with the charge of endeavoring to defeat the bill by procrastination, says I have always shown myself the enemy of the new States. The Senator is more anxious to impress this idea on the new States, than he is convinced of the truth of it. The charge is not only wholly unfounded in reference to myself, but is also so in respect to the action of this Government, which, so far as regards the new States, has been eminently paternal. Look at the munificent grants to several of these States, and to Alabama—one thirty-sixth of the public lands granted for the purposes of education, and other large and liberal grants for roads and other purposes; and yet we are to be taunted with the illiberality of our policy towards the new States.

Mr. C. said his language respecting the pre-emptioners had been distorted or misrepresented. He had been charged with having indulged in opprobrious terms towards this class, which he had never used. He was opposed now as then to the pre-emption law, not because he was opposed to the settlement and occupancy of the public domain, but because it was an appropriation to these individuals of a public and general property.

The Senator from Mississippi proposes a compromise; he asks me, will I vote in favor of the bill in case the amendment I propose will be adopted. The Senator has no right to ask this question. The bill is open to amendment by any Senator; and I will only say that if compelled to take the bill as offered by the committee, on the bill with the proposed amendment, I would infinitely prefer the amended bill. The Senator says there will be no necessity for this restriction, that the bill already limits the amount to one section for each applicant. Why, sir, there are forty land offices; a man has twelve children or twenty friends, and he can enter a section for each of them. It is also said that the restriction is oppressive and unjust; that the owner of contiguous lands who may want more land for timber or for stone, cannot acquire it. Not so; he can purchase it, but not at the reduced price—he can get it for $1 25 per acre. We are told that it is necessary these lands should be forced into market to supply the wants of the Government. He thought it surprising that gentlemen friendly to the Administration should place the Government in the position of a spendthrift or prodigal heir, who, after having squandered away all his ready means, was forced to dissipate his patrimony to supply his wants or his extravagance.

But we have a document on our table which has been quoted to prove the propriety of this measure; but really he could not see anything in it which was of much consequence, for there was about as much against the measure as in favor of it. But he would call the attention of the Senate to the manner in which this document was placed before us. A Senator goes to a clerk in the Treasury Department, and makes a verbal requisition for so much information, to be furnished at a certain hour; and when the information is ready, he desires it may be sent to another Senator. Well, the result is the document before us, which partakes of the perspicuity and lucidness which characterizes all the papers that proceed from the department of the modern Turge. How different is this procedure from the course which the Senate formerly took, when they were governed by considerations of correctness, order, and, he would add, if he thought it was properly appreciated, of dignity.

We have also held up to us for imitation a graduation scheme in operation in Mississippi, which somebody, three or four years ago, introduced into an Indian treaty for the purpose, he supposed, of making an "experiment," and probably as a precursor to the plan, on a grander scale, which we have now before us. [Mr. C. here went into an examination of the results of the sales of lands under the treaty with the Chickasaws, and contended that they were unfavorable.] It will be seen that these lands are liable to be graduated down to twelve and a half cents per acre; and there is no doubt, if the bill before us—this entering wedge—is successful, that the public lands of the United States will be eventually reduced to the same price.

In conclusion, Mr. C. would again say, that if compelled to vote for a bill unrestricted or one restricted in its provisions, he would infinitely prefer the latter. He had already disclaimed any intention of defeating the bill by delay, and this ought to be deemed sufficient among men of honor.

Now we see (continued Mr. B.) that the graduation system has been put in full force, with regard to the Chickasaw lands, and that in the space of five years it descended from one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, even down as low as twelve and a half cents.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said, that although he felt reluctant to consume any portion of the time of the Senate at this late period of the day, yet the course of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] rendered it incumbent on him to say a few words in reply. The Senator set out by charging him (Mr. C.) with having directed his remarks against him personally, rather than to the subject. Now, he was unconscious of having indulged in any personality incompatible with parliamentary usage, and did not believe he had said anything that would justify that imputation. True it was, (he said,) that he had complained of the unfairness of the time and manner in which the Senator from Kentucky had moved the recommitment of the bill; and, in relation to that view of the subject, he would take issue with the Senator as to the facts. The Senator from Kentucky undertook now to say that this bill had not before come up for consideration. What did the Senator mean by such an assertion? Did he really mean to say that the bill had not before been presented, so as to authorize the present motion for recommitment, or any motion to amend or modify it? If he did so intend, his assertion was wholly founded in error, and at variance with the facts. This bill, as he had before stated, was the first one introduced at the present session—it was brought in at the earliest moment consistent with the practice of the Senate—it had been twice read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, by whom it was reported back at their first meeting. A few days afterwards it came up in its order upon the Calendar, and was announced as the order of the day from the Chair, and was then open for discussion, or for any proposition for amendment or recommitment. Did the Senator then think proper to make any motion for amendment or recommitment? No: on the contrary, instead of moving to recommit, or amend, the Senator from Kentucky thought proper to move to postpone its consideration to a further day; and it was postponed. When it again came up, the Senator still withheld his motion for recommitment, and again moved its postponement for one week; but, finally, upon my suggestion, he agreed, and it was postponed till last Monday. It was not called up on that day, because another subject was before the Senate, occupying the whole day, and no friend of the bill, while that subject was pending, had a right to call it up. Mr. C. said the bill had now come up for the third time, and after all the previous delay which had taken place at his instance, the Senator made his motion for recommitment. Now it did seem to him that it would have been easy for the Senator to have drawn up his proposition, and to have moved the recommitment of the bill, on either of those occasions, instead of its postponement. If he had done so, the motion, even had it prevailed, would have occasioned no loss of time, as the committee could have made up their report in less time than had been consumed by either postponement. But the Senator from Kentucky thought proper to pursue a different course; one only calculated to produce delay after delay, and, in the end, to defeat the bill, as he had before said, by indirection. He said he did complain, as he had a right to do, of this kind of opposition to a measure he had so much at heart, and which was so closely connected with the best interests of his State and his constituents.

But the Senator from Kentucky, in alluding to his alleged hostility to the interests of the new States, intimates that it is rather my desire that he should seem to occupy that position than the necessary result of his conduct towards them. Sir, whilst I deem it unnecessary to reply to such an insinuation, I will take occasion to say that no wish or effort of mine is necessary to exhibit the Senator from Kentucky to the people of the new States in an attitude of hostility to all their most valued interests and most cherished rights. The record of his own votes in this body, the Journals of our debates, and his own political history, will be sufficient to give him his true position. Yes, sir, through those mediums they may find his hostility manifested by his opposition to every measure most closely identified with their prosperity and welfare. The people of the new States have seen his hostility in a continued and persevering opposition to every bill intended to give them the right of preemption; to secure them in the privilege of buying, at the same price which is received from others, the small tracts of land improved and made valuable by their own labor, and to protect and place them above the power of heartless speculators. They have seen his hostility manifested by the same persevering and determined opposition to every bill, like the one now under consideration, to reduce and graduate the price of the inferior and refuse lands within their limits—a measure no less just than eminently calculated to subserve their interests. Yes, sir, the people of the new States have not only witnessed and felt the hostility of the Senator from Kentucky, in his opposition to measures whose success was identified with their highest interests, but they have also seen his hostility evinced in his continued and persevering advocacy of a course of measures here which were at war with the best interests of the South and West. Mr. C. said he alluded more especially to the protective tariff and its kindred measures, misnamed the American system, the effect of which had been to take money out of their pockets and put it into those of other people. It would be necessary for the Senator to give other and better evidence of his friendly feelings toward them than was to be found in his asseverations here, before he could remove impressions resulting from his long course of opposition to the interests and feelings of the new States.

The Senator from Kentucky had taken occasion to speak of other charges, imputing to him unfriendly feelings towards the settlers; and he understood him to complain that epithets had been ascribed to him, which he had never used. Now, sir, I do not understand to what particular epithets the Senator refers; he has not thought proper to name them. But does he now undertake to say he did not denounce the settlers? He certainly cannot. It must be recollected by all that he spoke of them during the debate on the preemption bill, at the last session, with the utmost scorn and contempt; that he sneeringly denounced them as "squatters," as lawless depredators on the public property, as trespassers on the public domain; and alleged that they might as well seize upon the public treasure, or upon our vessels of war, or our forts and arsenals. Such were the denunciations uttered by the Senator from Kentucky against the settlers on the public lands, those hardy and industrious pioneers, whose labor and enterprise had contributed so largely to the growth, prosperity, and respectability of the West. Standing in the relation he did to the people of the new States, Mr. C. could not forget such denunciations. He had been willing to rest these charges, with the reports that had been made of the Senator's speeches, in the Journals, which were favorable as well as unfavorable to him. Mr. C. recollected some correction attempted to be made by the Senator from Kentucky, during the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, but it was not, in his opinion, of a character to render his imputations less offensive than he (Mr. C.) now represented them. He assured the Senator from Kentucky that his own acts, long continued and persevered in, his own language used on this floor, had created impressions towards him in the West and Southwest not easily to be eradicated.

Mr. C. said he always stood ready to vindicate the rights and honor of the people he represented; and to defend them here or elsewhere, against all aspersions upon their intelligence or their moral worth. If he did not, he said, he would be unworthy of the station he occupied. He never should forget what he owed to those people. He went among them, he said, when a very young man, without the adventitious aids of fortune or friends—relying upon his integrity and his industry for success. He had found them intelligent, hospitable, and generous. They had stood by him, and sustained him, when he most needed friends. They had honored him with their confidence, and conferred upon him more favors, doubtless, than he merited. This generous confidence had inspired him with feelings of gratitude toward them, never to be effaced. He would never be recreant to his duty, nor desert their interests, nor be unmindful of their honor. Mr. C. believed the Senator from Kentucky, too, had gone amongst the people of the West a youthful stranger; and "as a stranger, they bade him welcome." They had extended toward him, too, the hand of friendship, and had bestowed upon him all the manifestations of kindness and confidence. If the honorable Senator should think proper to pursue a different course toward the people of the great West, from that which he (Mr. C.) had indicated for himself, it was for that Senator to judge.

Mr. C. had said before, that the course pursued by the gentleman, was not only immediately injurious to the new States, in the present instance, but calculated to restrain the current of emigration, to fill up their population, and develop their resources. Every measure like the one taken by him on the present occasion, must be regarded by them as unfriendly to their welfare, so long as they retain their present intelligence. They knew that there were vast bodies of waste lands within their several limits, which their Legislatures were prevented from taxing, and thereby were compelled to lay heavier burdens on themselves. Must they not, therefore, view as hostile to their interests any opposition to a measure which would bring these lands into the market, at a price at which they might reasonably be expected to be sold? In conclusion, Mr. C. trusted the Senate would consider the delay already unnecessarily occasioned to this bill, and not by a recommitment risk the total loss of it at this session—especially as they had heard no new argument, no new objections that had not been fully and forcibly urged in a previous and ample discussion of it.

Mr. WALKER said he was not desirous that the Senator from Kentucky should be regarded in the West as an enemy of their interests. He had no feelings of personal animosity to gratify, and he could sincerely say, that regarding in this matter the interest of his State as paramount to all other considerations, he would rejoice if the Senator from Kentucky would lay down his opposition to this bill, if he would give it the sanction of his vote, and thus permit it to pass triumphantly through both Houses of Congress, which we all know it would do, but for the opposition of that Senator. The Senator from Kentucky had spoken of demagogues as connected with the support of this bill; but might there not be demagogues who opposed this bill, who addressed themselves to the supposed avarice of the old States, by proposing to distribute money among them? Who are the demagogues? Did the Senator mean to apply the epithet to the supporters of this bill upon this floor? [Here Mr. CLAY said, certainly not, he had expressly disclaimed any such allusion.] Then who are the demagogues supporting this measure? Are they the Legislative Assemblies of eight of the new States who have asked Congress to adopt the measure, or are they the people of the new States, who so anxiously desire its adoption? The Senator from Kentucky has again read, as he always does in the debate upon this bill, his tables of the comparative advance of population of the old and new States from 1820 to 1830. Why was this done? Was not its evident tendency to produce jealousy and animosity on the part of the old to the new States? But ought it not to be a subject of exultation to every American patriot that the mighty West is filling up with population; that within fifty years, a region of vast extent has been reclaimed from the wilderness; that State after State has been added to this great Confederacy; that star after star has been planted in our glorious banner, and the greatness and glory of our whole country almost immeasurably increased? But the Senator from Kentucky seems to think that the new States are increasing too rapidly, else why this invidious comparison between the relative growth of the old and the new States?

But the Senator tells us of the great results which would have followed from the passage of

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Graduation Bill—Mr. Clay, of Alabama, Mr. Clay, of Kentucky.

SENATE.

the distribution land bill. Sir, our truest glory will be, not in distributing money, but in augmenting our population, in filling up our whole country with a hardy and industrious people; not in restraining, but in encouraging emigration; not in keeping States out of the Union, but in bringing them into it; not in retarding, but in increasing our agricultural products; and he whose course here shall cause the settlement of a single State, nay, of a single county, will acquire more glory, and confer more lasting benefits upon his country, than he who shall extract for distribution millions of dollars, extorted by a heartless, speculating policy from the pockets of a suffering and impoverished people. But the Senator from Kentucky asks, why was not the graduation principle of this bill founded upon an actual valuation? Does not the Senator remember that this principle was incorporated in the bill reported by the committee at the last session; that it was then stricken out by the almost unanimous vote of the Senate? But the Senator from Kentucky desires us to wait until 1841; and why? That he may then have the census of 1840, from which to draw new discriminations and excite new jealousies between the old and the new States. No, sir; now is the proper time to act upon this bill, not only for the benefit of the new States, but to supply the wants of the Treasury.

Mr. BENTON said that the Senator from Kentucky, in examining the report made of the return of sales, had overlooked a portion of the document. Had he examined that part of it, he would have found the information, the absence of which is so much complained of. This answer, which is the subject of so much animadversion, was made out at my request. As a member of the Committee on Finance, I called at the Department, and requested the clerk to furnish these details, and to send them to me the next morning, when the bill was to be taken up. The clerk was requested to give the amounts, excluding fractions, which are not necessary for purposes of legislation. He thought that this course was equally dignified as the reading of newspaper paragraphs and letters, and making them the foundation for charges in that Chamber, or a Senator getting up and stating things as facts which he did not know of his own knowledge. If any Senator desired this information, which is now said to be important for correct legislation on this subject, why did he not call for it? He could have got it without any difficulty many days ago. The Secretary of the Treasury was arraigned—and he had been the subject of many arraignments lately—for not furnishing the detailed statements and tables on which his opinion was formed—he was blamed for not putting on one page of this document, what the Committee on Finance had already placed on the other. Now, sir, we all know the Secretary is a hard-working man; but I hope the Senate will excuse him for not performing this unnecessary labor. Mr. President, you have been in Congress a quarter of a century, and I would ask you is there any subject upon which we have more printed information than this subject of the public lands? Why, sir, we have entire volumes of figures on the subject. The Finance Committee had all the desired information before them, without calling on the Secretary for a single item of information. We had it all before us.

Mr. B. here read details of amount of lands in the States subject to be operated upon by the bill. He went over the new States, one by one, and showed that all the information was before the Senate which the subject required, and far more than was used by those who were calling out for more, without seeming to know how much was already on hand. He was certain that there was full information before the Senate, and that there had been no compromise of senatorial dignity in the manner of obtaining it.

After some remarks from Mr. MERRICK, Mr. WALKER observed that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] had offered a resolution to call for the quantity of land sold since the 30th of September, 1837, which had, in January last, been returned by the Secretary of the Treasury as having been in market five, ten, fifteen, and twenty years prior to the 1st of January, 1833. Mr. W. regretted that this information was not now before the Senate, for he was convinced that the returns of sale would show that in very many of the land districts these lands, if sold in the time to come, at the same rate at which they had been disposed of during the last year, would not be sold at the present minimum price in a period exceeding that which had elapsed since the formation of the world. And in relation to the entire aggregate of these lands, Mr. W. was persuaded that the returns would show that a present sale of all these lands, even at twenty-five cents per acre, would be a better financial operation than to sell them within the time designated by these returns, (calculating the loss of interest,) at $1 25 per acre. Unless the Senator from Maryland can produce some document which will show that these lands will sell in sixteen years at the present price, he ought not, as a financier, to oppose this measure.

January 3, 1839.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, observed that the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky was the first that he had ever made in favor of actual settlers on the public lands. It came unfortunately, however, at the present moment, as the existing laws gave the preemption right to the actual settler till the 22d June, 1840. This fact would be ascertained by looking at the act itself, which was approved 22d June, 1838, declaring in the very first clause, "That every actual settler of the public lands, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, who was in possession and a housekeeper, by personal residence thereon, at the time of the passage of the act, and for four months next preceding, shall be entitled to all the benefits and privileges of an act entitled 'An act to grant preemption rights to settlers on the public lands,' approved 29th May, 1830."

But, as he said yesterday, where was the necessity for recommitting this bill, when it was open for amendment? Would this recommitment have any other effect than that of defeating the bill by delay? The gentleman had spoken of the immense quantities of public lands subject to the operations of this bill. But the gentleman omitted to mention the length of time that a vast portion of them had been in the market without finding purchasers.

Mr. C. thought the provisions of the bill, in all its bearings, were well understood, and, therefore, it would be much better to amend it in the Senate than to send it back to the committee. As, he presumed, the question on the gentleman's motion was divisible, he moved that the question on the several branches of recommitment, and of instructing the committee, be taken separately, and that they be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, asked if the Senator from Alabama intended to say that the preemption law of last session gave the actual settler the right of entry at one dollar, or at seventy-five cents per acre, as his remarks would bear that construction. If so, the Senator was certainly mistaken. Mr. C. said he thought it much better to recommit the bill with instructions; as the committee-room was much the best place for remodeling it so as to make its details conform to the principle contained in the instructions.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he did not wish to be misunderstood. He certainly agreed with the Senator from Kentucky, that the preemption act did not, without a further provision, give to the settlers the right to purchase, at the reduced prices; but what he meant to be understood as saying was this: the law of the last session did give the right of preemption to every settler on the public lands, whether the lands occupied by him had been offered at public auction or not; and if, said he, we reduce the price of the public lands by this bill, the individual occupant would have the right to purchase at such reduced price. This law, then, would operate to give the settler not only the right of preemption but that right at the reduced price. He had no objection to limit the right of preemption at periods after the reduction. But he wished that, for a certain number of months after the reduction, the occupant should have the right of preemption. His object was to protect the occupants, but not to limit the right of purchasing these inferior lands to occupants alone. His object was to let all the lands embraced by the bill be subject to sale at the reduced prices, whether occupied or not; always, however, giving the right of preemption to the occupant for a time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, said that he did not wish to enter at large into the discussion of this subject, already so ably elucidated by Senators in favor of the passage of the bill, but merely to reply to that portion of the speech of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, based on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting the sales of land under a treaty made with the Chickasaw Indians in 1832, which treaty contains a provision for the graduation of the price of the land on principles precisely similar to the provisions of the bill now under discussion; but much more rapidly than the provisions of the present bill. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) the provisions of that treaty are, that all lands offered for sale, and not sold, shall be subject to private sale or entry for one year thereafter, at $1 25 per acre; after which time the balance remaining unsold shall be subject to sale or entry at one dollar per acre for the space of one year, and that for and during the third year, the remainder shall be subject to sale or entry at fifty cents per acre.

By this treaty the Chickasaw Indians ceded a country containing a fraction less than six millions of acres; the treaty also contained a provision for allowing the Indians liberal reserves, which were settled by the constituted authorities at about three thousand three hundred sections, equal to two millions one hundred and twelve thousand acres, (he spoke from memory,) being more than one third part of the whole territory ceded by the Indians to the Government. The country was then, for all practical purposes, a country of refuse land at the date of the President's first proclamation of a sale. But the honorable Senator, finding from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that less land had been sold on the third year, when offered at fifty cents, than was sold either of the two preceding years at higher prices, assumed the position that the sale of the whole public domain was limited to a demand of about three and a half millions annually, and came to the sage conclusion that the sale would not be at all promoted by a reduction of price; and as evidence of the correctness of this position, he maintained the more the price was reduced by the operation of the Chickasaw treaty, less land was sold. Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) the Senator held up this report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and exultingly proclaimed it to be a refutation of the graduation principle. Mr. W. would call the particular attention of the honorable Senator to the subject. On the correctness of this position he would fearlessly risk the fate of the bill now under consideration. It appears by this same report of the Secretary of the Treasury from which the gentleman read, that the first sale of the Chickasaw land in Mississippi was commenced on the 4th day of January, 1836, at which sale 960,023 acres were offered, and at the close of the sale there remained unsold and subject to sale at private entry 576,892 acres at $1 25 per acre for twelve months thereafter, during which time 207,545 acres were sold; and that during the second year, when the land was subject to entry at $1 per acre, 37,016 acres were sold; amounting to an average sale of 101 acres per day; after which time the land remaining unsold was subject to sale or entry at fifty cents per acre, and so continued to the date of this report, the 30th of September, 1838, embracing a period of near ten months, during which time 58,565 acres were sold, being at the average rate of 197 acres per day, nearly doubling the sale of the previous year.

And now, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) let us examine the second sale began on the 5th September, 1836; there was then offered 2,601,130 acres, and at the close of the sale there remained of the land then offered and unsold 2,026,127 acres; subject to private sale for one year thereafter, during which time 189,500 acres were sold at $1 25 per acre, being at the average rate of 519 acres per day, and that of the balance remaining unsold, and subject to entry during the second year, at $1 per acre, 37,280 acres were sold, being at the average rate of 102 acres per day; and thereafter the land remaining unsold was subject to sale at fifty cents per acre; but the report of the Secretary of the Treasury covers only a period of twenty-five days, from the 5th to the 30th September, 1838, during which time 26,080 acres were sold, being at the average rate of 1,049 acres per day, and yielding $524 50 per day, while during the preceding year only $1 02 per day was received when the land was sold at $1 per acre. Here, then, is an exemplification of the operation of the graduation system, producing just the result the friends of the measure have always contended it would produce—enrich your Treasury, and promote the sale of refused land. Mr. W. trusted the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the Committee on Finance, so lightly treated on yesterday, are fully sustained by the practical operation of this great measure in one of the States.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, thought that the data given by the Senator from Mississippi did not controvert the proposition he had heretofore suggested, and he thought that his views were sustained by the returns embraced in the report, that the sales of the land were limited to the demand, and were not increased by the reduction of the price.

Mr. WALKER regretted that the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] whose position ought to identify him in feeling and interest with the people of the West, should persevere in his hostility to this great measure, when other statesmen, even of his own party from the far distant East, were found to be our friends and advocates. Mr. W. regretted that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] was not here to speak his own sentiments on the subject of graduation; but as he was absent, Mr. W. would read an extract from the speech of that Senator, delivered at Niblo's Saloon, in the city of New York, on the 15th of April, 1837.

"The main object in regard to the public lands is, undoubtedly, to settle them as fast as the growth of our population, and its augmentation by emigration, may enable us to settle them. The lands, therefore, should be sold at a low price; and, for one, I have never doubted the right or expediency of granting portions of the lands themselves, or of making grants of money for objects of internal improvements connected with them. I have always supported liberal appropriations for the purpose of opening communications to and through these lands by common roads, canals, and railroads; and when lands of little value have been long in market, and, on account of their indifferent quality, are not likely to command the common price, I know no objection to a reduction of price as to such lands, so that they may pass into private ownership."

These (said Mr. W.) were the expanded, liberal, and patriotic views of the great statesman of the East in regard to the reduction of the price of the public lands. These were the opinions of a Senator remote from us in position; and how did they contrast with the narrow, anti-western policy of the Senator from Kentucky. Nor was the Senator from Massachusetts unsupported by other distinguished citizens of the northern States. The President of the United States [Mr. Van Buren] had distinctly recommended graduation.

"Our experience under the act passed at the last session, to grant preemption rights to settlers on the public lands, has as yet been too limited to enable us to pronounce with safety upon the efficacy of its provisions to carry out the wise and liberal policy of the Government in that respect. There is, however, the best reason to anticipate favorable results from its operation. The recommendations formerly submitted to you in respect to a graduation of the price of the public lands, remain to be finally acted upon. Having found no reason to change the views then expressed, your attention to them is again respectfully requested."

This, then, (said Mr. W.,) is not merely a policy advocated by the new States and their citizens, but by statesmen of liberal and expanded views, remote from us in position. Whilst, then, the two great statesmen of both parties from the North were thus friendly to the policy of reduction, was it not extraordinary that a western man should be found opposing the interest of the whole West on this great question? Mr. W. said, not only was the Senator from Kentucky the ardent and untiring opponent of this great measure, but he felt bound to declare that the opposition of that Senator constituted the sole obstacle to triumphant passage of this bill through both Houses of Congress, and that, if the bill were defeated, that defeat must be justly attributed to the course pursued by the Senator from Kentucky. Whilst, then, the note of praise was heard in favor of that honorable Senator in those sections of the Union that desire to restrain emigration to the West, let the new States hear what he (Mr. W.) and the whole Senate well knew to be the fact, that, if this measure, so important to the West, was defeated, in looking for him who struck the fatal blow, we might all point to the Senator from Kentucky and exclaim, "thou art the man."

Mr. MORRIS rose to make a single remark. He would not have done so but for the allusion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] to himself. He had always been the friend of a graduation of the price of the public lands. The first act of his, after entering into this body, was to bring in a bill to graduate the price of the public lands to the actual settlers. He thought that, to be consistent with his whole course heretofore on this subject, he ought to sustain the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] says that the owner of a contiguous farm may wish, among other reasons, to enter a portion of these lands for the purpose of keeping off a bad neighbor. Mr. M. feared that the operations of this bill, if it should pass, would enable the rich man, who had selected a fertile spot in the midst of comparatively a dreary waste, but not so dreary but what a poor man might find a home on it, to drive off and preclude the poor man from his settlement, because he might choose to deem him a bad neighbor. Mr. M. would give the privilege of entry at the reduced price to no man who was not on the land at the present time, or who would not go on it and settle it.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] says the Senator from Kentucky will not vote for this bill, even if amended in accordance with his instructions. Sir, (said Mr. M.,) is it not the right, nay, the bounden duty of the Senator from Kentucky to make a proposition, even if opposed to it, as little objectionable as possible? It was his duty, and he thought it very strange that he should be censured for doing so. For his own part, if a proposition met the approval of his judgment, he should not look at the quarter it came from, nor what political party sustained it; it should have his support.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, observed that the Senator from Mississippi, by way of sustaining his views on this occasion, had thought proper to state opinions of two distinguished citizens from different parts of the country. The opinions of the Senator from Massachusetts had been referred to, and with regard to his opinions he had nothing to say; they were well known to the Senator not to be the sentiments that he (Mr. C.) entertained; but he rose to do justice to another individual, the present Chief Magistrate of the United States; and if the gentlemen would content themselves with acting in conformity to his recommendations, the bill would not be so objectionable. The gentleman referred to the message at the opening of the present session; but he ought to have referred to the message of the previous one, which was referred to in the last message. Now he (Mr. C.) thought that the message to which he alluded, contained a decided reprobation of this bill.

[Here Mr. C. read some extracts from the President's message.]

Mr. C. continued. So that it would be seen that it was actual valuation, and not conjectural valuation, founded on the lapse of time, was the principle on which the President recommended a reduction of the price of the public lands. The principle in this bill was the one that the President decidedly condemned. Mr. C. said it was well known to be one of the established laws of political economy, that if the market was glutted, there would be a languor in the sales, whereas, if the supply was limited, prices would advance to a ruinous extent. The President had seen this, and the conclusion to which he had reached, was that the mere efflux of time afforded no criterion by which we can measure value.

Mr. C. felt very reluctant to legislate on this important subject at the present session. He felt most anxious that it should be left to the ensuing Congress; that they should remit it to their successors, and not settle it now. Were there not profound considerations which should induce them to refer it to the next Congress? In the first place, the President had recommended to them to provide at this session for taking the enumeration of the population and resources of the country, as required by the Constitution. The results of this census would show the amount of increase in the population and wealth of the new States, and whether a measure of the kind was needed for their further advancement. As to the proposition to increase the population of the new States by the settlement of their lands, there was no necessity for the passing of this bill. These new members of the Confederacy had already increased in population and wealth with a celerity unexampled in the history of the world. But there was another consideration. Great as was the quantity of the public domain in any one of the new States, it was not worth a baubee in comparison with the seven hundred and fifty millions of acres exterior to their limits, and to the millions yet to be brought into the market. Would it be right, in consequence of any presumed financial difficulties, to throw away this domain, which we should transmit to our posterity for ages to come, to supply the present exigencies of the exchequer? There was another reason why they should not act on this matter at this session. He did not believe that either of the two Houses of Congress reflected the genuine sentiments of the American people. It was known that the elections which had taken place had very much changed the complexion of the two bodies, and that in one of them the changes that had taken place would reverse the majority on the present question. Convulsed as the country was by experiments and financial projects, was it right, in advance of that enumeration of the population it was recommended by the President now to provide for—was it right, in the view of the charges made by the recent elections, and, in short, under all the circumstances to which he had adverted, to make this great radical change in the disposition of the public lands which was not limited to the new States only, but extended to the shores which were washed by the ocean at the extremities of this continent?

Mr. BENTON rose in consequence of the endless attacks made upon an eminent citizen now retired from public life, and seeking repose under his own vine, and by the side of his own fire, but for whom, it would seem, there was to be no peace on this side of the grave. He alluded to the late President of the United States, General Jackson, and to the repeated instances in which his name had been dragged into this debate, and tyranny and mischief attributed to him for his conduct in relation to the act for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. That conduct had been denounced as tyrannical and unconstitutional, and to it had been attributed all the late moneyed embarrassments of the country. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] is the author of these denunciations, and also the author of the bills—for there were two of them—the loss of which he so much deplores, and for the want of which he has seen so much evil arise. I (said Mr. B.) was the cotemporary of these bills. I knew their character and their fate; I saw their birth and their death, and great and numerous as are the acts which stamp the character of a hero-statesman on General Jackson, there are none which exalt him more than his conduct in relation to these very bills. It was wise, patriotic, constitutional, and heroic conduct. He had the wisdom to see the pernicious nature of these bills; he had the constitutional right to arrest them; and he had the heroism to exercise that right. The bills were of Graduation Bill—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

This table exhibits the detail and the gross of the amounts which would have been taken from the Treasury in eighteen months, if the land bill of 1836 had passed, with the detail and the gross also of what was actually required for the service of the Government for the same time. They amount, in round numbers, to $55,000,000 for distribution, and $55,000,000 for the support of Government; in all $110,000,000! Now, sir, how was the Treasury to stand this enormous call? It could not have stood it all! It could not have stood the first pull, the first seventeen and a quarter millions for distribution, and seven and three quarters for the public service, which would have been required on the 1st day of July, 1836. It would have failed at that payment; and so I declared, and in my own opinion, demonstrated at that time; and so the event proved, when the deposit act passed, and substituted a smaller and later distribution. This deposit act passed in June of 1836; it began to take effect in January, 1837; it proposed to divide out but $36,000,000, and that by $9,000,000 at a time, and to commence the distribution six months later than the land bill proposed; and yet what was the result? The result was the stoppage of the principal deposit banks, and all the rest of the banks within five months after the distribution began to take effect! The deposit banks made the first distribution in January; they nearly sunk under the second installment in April; they were unable to meet the third one in July, and closed their doors in May; and, while several causes contributed to the result, yet it must never be forgotten that the committee of the New York banks, where the stoppage began, in enumerating the four principal causes for that event, placed at the head of those causes, the operation of the DEPOSIT OR DISTRIBUTION act of June, 1836? Thus experience proved that the deposit banks could not stand a distribution of thirty-six millions, commencing six months later than the proposed land bill distribution, and made in quarterly installments of only nine millions at a time. How, then, could they have stood a distribution of fifty-five millions, commencing six months earlier, and the first installment amounting to seventeen and a quarter millions? The thing was impossible; it could not be done; and that was so evident to me that I proclaimed it, and reiterated my opinion on this floor in language too strong, in the judgment of some of my friends, to be allowed to go to the country; and what was that opinion bottomed upon? Upon the fact known to us all, and by me repeated a thousand times, that what was called a surplus of forty millions in the Treasury, was a mere DELUSION; that the money, in point of fact, was NOT in the deposit banks; that it had been LENT out; that Congress had sanctioned and instigated the LENDING, by requiring interest from the banks for its use; that, instead of being in the banks it was in the hands of merchants, traders, dealers, manufacturers, mechanics, speculators, and others; that the banks had used it with the knowledge of Congress, and with the implied contract and fair understanding of having the use of it till gradually called for on account of the public service; and that to call for all this money in masses, and almost without notice (for the first payment would have begun as soon as the bill could have been passed) was to COMPEL THE LARGE DEPOSIT BANKS TO CHOOSE BETWEEN STOPPING PAYMENT THEMSELVES, OR DESTROYING THEIR DEBTORS. All this was so plain to me that it was amazing, incomprehensible, and almost incredible that any person could avoid seeing the same. Yet this is the measure, the loss of which we are called upon to deplore! This is the measure, the patriotic resistance of which, by General Jackson, is denounced as an act of tyranny! This is the measure, then believed to be irresistibly popular, now known to be heartily condemned by every considerate man! This is the measure before which General Jackson, and all its opponents were expected to be prostrated; (and before which they were willing to have been prostrated if such had been the penalty of adherence to their principles;) this is the measure which, like the consular distributions of grain, and money, and public lands, among the voters in the degenerate days of the Roman Republic, was expected to purchase the suffrages of all the people? General Jackson and his friends, myself one of them, did what they believed was right in resisting this measure, without regard to consequences personal to themselves. They resisted the colossal distribution of fifty-five millions of money. They threw themselves upon the intelligence, the patriotism, and the candor of their fellow-countrymen; and the event has proved that they were not mistaken in their estimate of that candor, that intelligence, and that patriotism! It has proved that the American people are not yet ready to be seduced and debauched with the spoils and pillage of their own country.

Sir, (said Mr. B.) I pursue this bill of May, 1836, one step further; I pursue it into the fourth section, and see that nothing but a WAR with a FOREIGN POWER could have arrested the distribution of the $55,000,000, and given the Treasury a right to retain the $24,877,179 received from the public lands in 1836, and the 6,776,236 received from them in 1837. By the terms of the act, the distribution was to go on without regard to anything but a foreign war, and the $32,000,000 received from the lands in 1836 and '37 were to belong to the States, and to be paid to them, without the least regard to the condition of the public Treasury. It was a specific appropriation of the proceeds of the lands, and as such would have been paid over to the States on the days named in the act. The "shutting up" of the Treasury would have made no difference; the stoppage of the banks would have made no difference; there was no foreign war—the appropriation was specific and absolute—and the delivery of the money to the States would have been compulsory and inevitable. What then? Why, that notwithstanding the retroactive disbursements from the Treasury of the before received revenues from the lands of 1833, '34, and '35—notwithstanding the attempt to disburse these old expended revenues might have bankrupted the deposit banks—yet the current receipts from the lands for 1836 and '37 would have been turned over to the States as they came in! The $25,000,000 (nearly) of 1836 would have gone to the States; the $7,000,000 (nearly) of 1837 would have gone to them also! and thus, with the banks all stopped; with the Treasury shut up, with Congress called together to provide the ways and means of keeping the Government in motion; with the duties from customs sinking down to nothing; merchants' duty-bonds postponed; balances from banks delayed for many months; with all this we should have been paying out to the States the $7,000,000 of hard money received from the lands in 1837, and which $7,000,000 in specie was the sheet-anchor of the Government in that disastrous year, and the only thing which saved it from the degradation and ruin of using depreciated paper money and shipmasters!

Mr. President, we hear much of the incapacity, the ignorance, the incompetency, and the recklessness of the Jackson administration; we hear much of all this from the Opposition, without their being able to specify a measure to which these epithets will apply; but here is an act of the Opposition itself, which places the leaders in a position to choose between a confession of absolute incapacity to manage the public affairs, or of a deliberate design to bankrupt the Treasury and the banks. No, Mr. President, the Jackson Administration was not ignorant, was not reckless, was not incompetent; and to hurl such epithets at that Administration, is to hurl them at the people, by whom that Administration was created and has been sustained. To attack that Administration, approved as it was in the triumphant second election of General Jackson, and in the triumphant election of his successor, is to attack the capacity of the people for self-government! It is to attack the elective principle of our Constitution, and to say that that principle ought to be abolished, and an hereditary ruler given as a guardian to those who were so incompetent to choose their own Chief Magistrate. No, sir! Great are the services which General Jackson has rendered to his country—great in the field—still greater in the Cabinet. His civil administration was a continued series of patriotic exertions, the emanation no less of a heroic soul, than of a sagacious head, and a patriot heart. None but a hero could have acted the part, in civil affairs, which he did. Above all men who have lived in our eventful times, a single individual, perhaps, alone excepted, he will be stamped the hero-statesman of the age. I have heretofore endeavored to do some justice to his various, transcendent, and victorious policy. I have endeavored to present some views of his numerous, brilliant, and successful ameliorations at home, and negotiations abroad. I have endeavored to present him as posterity will view him, covered, illustrated, irradiated with every species of glory, and above all with the glory of usefulness—with the glory of having improved the condition, bettered the circumstances, advanced the fortune, and personally benefited every industrious inhabitant which the country contains. I have endeavored to do this; and I appeal to the present unparalleled, unrivaled, unprecedented, unexampled, universal, pervading, and exulting prosperity of the country for the truth and fidelity of the pictures which I have endeavored to draw.

It is not my intention to repeat, on the present occasion, what I have heretofore delivered on this subject; but there is one point which, though heretofore mentioned, has never been presented with the fulness, individuality, and development which its importance and magnitude deserves. I allude to our cotton production and its influence upon the wealth and industry of every portion of this extended Union, and the part which General Jackson has acted in bringing that production to what it now is, and to what it must be. What was the extent of our cotton-growing territory before the victorious arms of General Jackson acquired for us the vast region of the South and Southwest? It was a part of South Carolina, a part of Georgia, some slips in North Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana. What is it now? It is all Florida, all Georgia, all Alabama, all Mississippi, all Louisiana, all Arkansas, South Carolina, a part of North Carolina, a third of Tennessee, and a slip in Missouri. In territorial extent our cotton-growing region has been increased more than tenfold by the victorious arms of General Jackson over the southern Indians, and by his still more victorious policy over the political allies of those Indians, their federal allies, whose struggle it was to retain them in the southern States to diminish their political importance and to cripple their advance. What was the value of our cotton export before these great operations of General Jackson began? It was $14,000,000. What is it now? It is $80,000,000. And what is its capacity of augmentation? Almost limitless and boundless, or only limited by the wants of Europe, Asia, Africa, and the two Americas; for to all these countries, even to the Ganges and the Black Sea, to the Cape of Good Hope, and to Terra-del-Fuego do our American cottons now go. And what is the influence of this vast production, so amazingly augmented under the victorious arms, and still more victorious policy, of ONE MAN—what is its influence upon the industry, the pursuits, and the wealth of every part of this extended Confederacy? To answer this question, let the mind's eye figure to itself a map of this Union, and then contemplate every species of industry which is carried on upon the vast diversified domain which it represents. Let him look at our shipping interest from the Chesapeake to Passamaquoddy bay, all finding its greatest and richest employment in carrying our cotton abroad, and bringing back the productions of so many nations received in exchange for it. Let him see our most opulent merchants, throughout the whole extent of our coast, from New Orleans to New York, all bottoming their largest operations upon the cotton of the South. Look to the manufacturing industry of the whole northeast, of which Massachusetts may be taken as an example, and as the highest pattern; manufactures of leather, cotton, wool, iron, brass, tin, wood, glass, stone, &c., the grand aggregate of which, in all the northeast, may be judged of from the annual product of near ninety millions of dollars for Massachusetts alone; and a goodly proportion of the whole of which finds its market in the same cotton-growing region. Crossing the Alleghany mountains, and descending upon the western waters, see twelve millions of manufactured articles, the product of the industry of three or four miles square at the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongahela; see these twelve millions annually going off from Pittsburg, and the largest part going to the cotton planters of the South; while many other towns and villages of the West, on a smaller scale, emulate the meritorious example of "the Birmingham of the West." Then see the agricultural States of the Great Valley. See Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, with their vast productions of grain, and their innumerable herds and flock, all finding their richest market in the same region. Turning to the Middle States, where the value of labor, for a long time, has been so much reduced, we see that value in Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, and Tennessee, has found a vast augmentation from the cultivation of cotton. So that in every part of this extended Confederacy, and over every species of creative industry, the augmented cultivation of cotton, the fruit of General Jackson's military achievements and civil policy has extended its benefits and shed its benign influences. The North, the East, the West, and the middle States—the cities and the country—agriculture, manufactures, and commerce—all, all find employment for their industry, and rich rewards for their skill and labor in that perennial fountain of national wealth—the cotton-growing region of the South—which, while it showers gold upon all others, is itself largely deprived of its own advantages by illusive systems of political economy—a system which leads it to purchase everything by the paper-money standard of the United States, while it sells the only article it produces by the hard-money standard of Europe! Every part of this Union feels the beneficent effects of the cotton crops; and no part feels it more than the agricultural region of Kentucky, and the manufacturing districts of Massachusetts. I have lately traveled in Kentucky, and speak from the knowledge of my own senses. I have lately received an authentic return of the annual manufactures of Massachusetts, and speak upon unimpeachable authority. Kentucky and Massachusetts are the two States of this Union which have profited most by the military victories and the civil administration of General Jackson; they are the two States of this Union which owe most to his arms and to his policy; they are the two States of this Union which should be bound to him by the strongest ties of gratitude and affection. The agriculturist of Kentucky is now on the high road to wealth; his prosperity reposes upon a solid and imperishable basis. His cattle, his mules, his horses, his hemp, all wanted in the South, command the highest price, fill his coffers with vast sums of money, and reflect upon his lands an unprecedented value. It is no longer the illusions of the high tariff—it is no longer the illusions of the "golden fleece," two thousand dollars for a sheep intrinsically worth twenty shillings, and now sunk to that price—it is no longer the deceptive dream of these ephemeral illusions which tickled and beguiled the Kentuckian before Jackson's administration, but it is now the solid basis of the cotton cultivation in the South, and free trade in Europe, upon which his prosperity reposes. Let him cultivate the cotton-grower, and cherish free trade abroad, and never again fall into the illusions of high tariff and national bank, and never again will he see his crops rotting on his hands, his property sinking to no price, his currency depreciated one half, and piles of property laws, tender laws, relief laws, and stay laws, interposed between the hapless debtor and the merciless creditor. So much for Kentucky; and equal with hers, and resting in good part upon the same basis, is the prosperity of Massachusetts. The cotton grower of the South takes a part of all that she has to spare. From "brushes, brooms, and baskets, and buttons of all kinds," up to her eighteen millions of dollars' worth of manufactures in shoes, boots, and leather; her seventeen millions of manufactures of cotton; her ten millions of manufactures of wool; her nine millions and a half of fish and oil; her two millions of ready-made clothing, stocks, and suspenders; her two millions and a half of nails, brads, and tacks; her million and a half of soap and candles, her million and a half of paper; her million and a quarter of rum; her million of refined sugar; her two millions of straw bonnets and palm leaf hats—and many other articles "too tedious to enumerate," but amounting, in conjunction with those enumerated, to eighty-six millions of dollars per annum. From all these she sends a part to the cotton grower, and doubtless gets a better part of the crop than the grower himself receives; an advantage which is the fair and legitimate fruit of industry, conducted by skill, guarded by economy, and diversified by enterprise. It was the last year of President Jackson's administration—the year ending the 31st day of March, 1837—which presented this magnificent result of Massachusetts manufacturing industry. I say manufacturing—for the proceeds of her commerce and agriculture are not included—and this grand result will forever stand as a proof of the prosperity of the country under the sagacious policy of that illustrious statesman.

Sir, it was no part of my intention to make a eulogy upon General Jackson. The time is coming when history, and poetry, and sculpture, and painting, and the living voices of endless generations will do him that service. I make no general eulogy. I have spoken to a single point, to show from one example, the beneficent nature of his policy, and the universality of its happy influence upon all parts of our country, and upon all the pursuits of its industry. I have spoken to a single point, and have not exhausted that one, for to this same cotton region we are indebted for the hundred millions of gold and silver which has sustained the country and the Government in the late shock, and which hereafter are to render the people independent of the rise and fall of banks, and safe from the shocks and explosions of the paper system. What I have said has been forced out of me by attacks, as wanton as they are incessant, upon the hero-patriot who is entitled to repose, now that he has withdrawn from the world and given an example of the manner in which an ex-President of the United States should spend the evening of his days, and close up the career of his life.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the question on Mr. CLAY's proposition was divided, so as to take it first on the recommitment, and secondly on the instructions.

On the question of recommitment, the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, and Williams of Maine—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—20.

Previous to the vote being taken on the question of instruction,

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, and by general consent, the number of acres to be granted to each actual settler was left blank in the instructions.

The question was then taken on the instructions thus modified, and was carried by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Walker, and Williams of Maine—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—17.

And the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, January 6, 1839.

The Senate resumed, as the special order of the day, the consideration of the bill to provide for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

The question being on the following amendment, reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, in conformity with the instructions of the Senate, when the bill was recommitted:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the right of entry at the prices reduced by the foregoing section, shall be limited to those who are now, or who may hereafter become, actual settlers; and the person applying to make any such entry, under this act, shall file an affidavit, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, that such applicant is, at the time, or intends, in good faith, to become, an actual settler on the land proposed to be entered, or some part thereof, for that he owns and cultivates adjoining lands; and that such applicant makes the entry in his own name, for his own benefit, and not in trust for another."

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to amend the amendment, by inserting the words or "who may own contiguous adjoining land;" so as to extend the benefits of the bill to persons who are now settled on and are cultivating farms of their own.

Mr. C. said that the object of this amendment was so apparent that he would not occupy any more of the time of the Senate in explaining it. The amendment reported by the committee, under the instruction of the Senate, went to limit the operations of the act to actual settlers, only, or those who might give evidence of their intention to become so. The committee thought it proper that the benefits of it should be extended to those who are cultivating farms of their own, and who might wish to purchase tracts adjoining to them. It was well known to all the gentlemen of the new States that, in a variety of instances, there were settlers who had entered not more land than was barely sufficient for their cultivation, intending at a future period to purchase more for the various uses of a farm, such as timber, pasturage, &c. Now the question was, shall persons thus situated be cut off from the benefits of this bill, even where they owned so small a quantity of land as forty acres, while every individual in the old States had the privilege of purchasing at the reduced price six hundred and forty acres, with the condition only of settling on it. And inasmuch as the provisions of this bill limited the quantity to be entered, the committee could see no such danger from monopoly or speculation as had been intimated on that floor.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, without intending any disrespect to the committee, thought their report was not in conformity with the instructions of the Senate. The instructions contained two specific restrictions: the first was to limit the provisions of the bill to the actual settler, and the second was to limit the quantity. Though the number of acres was left blank in the instructions, he expected that the committee would have filled it. Now, when a bill is sent to a committee with specific instructions, he thought they were bound to conform strictly to them, and so to remodel the bill as that the intention of the instructions shall be fulfilled; but, in the present instance, the committee have not confined themselves to this duty, but have recommended an extension of the benefits to another class. Now he had no objection to any individual member of the committee offering this amendment, but he did object to its being brought before the body with the official weight and sanction of the committee in favor of its adoption. He said that much as to the manner in which the proposition was brought forward, and he would now say a few words in relation to its merits.

Mr. C. thought there was no difficulty to prevent the owner of a farm to purchase the waste lands contiguous to it at $1 25 per acre; and he thought if any rich landed proprietors wished to add section after section to their almost unbounded possessions, let them do it, but let it be at the Government price. Now what is to be the effect of the amendment proposed by the committee? It is that any farmer or planter in the new States will be enabled to purchase land at the reduced prices, while the citizens of the old States would be precluded from doing so. How can the Senators from the old States support this invidious discrimination? How can the Senators from Pennsylvania and Virginia do so—he alluded more particularly to Virginia, as she had bestowed the most princely gift that was ever bestowed by one Government upon another. Where is the authority in law, constitution, justice, or equity, to make this distinction between the citizens of the old and new States? He could see none, and he thought that none existed.

Mr. C. said if we were compelled to act on this subject at the present time, he was for restricting the operations of the bill as much as possible. But he thought it very unwise at this session to legislate at all upon this subject, for reasons he had given at a former day; but if we are to act, let us conform to the sense of the Senate as expressed in their instructions. The Senate, by their vote on that question, declared its intention to be to limit the advantages of the bill to actual settlers. He was for sustaining that declaration, and trusted there would be no enlargement of its provisions.

After the question was taken on the recommitment, and decided in the affirmative, an appeal was made by different Senators to the mover [Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky] to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on the instructions to confine the provisions of the bill to actual settlers, to which he assented.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, objected; he said he had voted to recommit the bill, but it was with a knowledge that the question upon the instructions was still pending; without the instructions he could not have given that vote. He now required that the yeas and nays shall be put upon the Journals that it may be seen who are the friends of the actual settler in preference to the speculator. His previous vote would then be fully explained. He went for graduation; but he wished the benefit of the reduced price to inure to the actual settler.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, was not aware that he exhibited this morning anything like the boldness which had been attributed to him by the Senator from Mississippi. It was a quality of which he never boasted, and of which he did not believe he was particularly deficient. The boldness which he exhibited, according to the Senator from Mississippi, was an attempt to array the old States against the new, and to contrast their population. Now, if there had been an attempt to discriminate between the old and new States, it was the amendment brought in by the Senator from Mississippi and his colleague on the committee; and even admitting that there had been an extraordinary degree of boldness, it was not exhibited till it was necessary to speak the truth. What was the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi? It was to disfranchise the old States; to cut off from the privileges of this bill the thirteen old States who established our independence, in favor of the occupants in the new States. The object of the Senate, on a former occasion, was to restrict the settlements to emigrants from all the States; but, not content with that restriction, it was proposed to extend the privilege to owners of lands in the large States, who have been settled for years; to make grants to them at the expense of the freeholders of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and the other old States.

Mr. C. denied that he had attempted to array the old States against the new. It was the gentlemen who repelled every attempt to make this common property conducive to the common benefit—who seek, in the way of graduation and preemption laws, to secure exclusive privileges for their own States; and the moment a proposition was made to render the benefits from this common property common, the answer was: "Oh, no! that is injurious to the new States." Mr. C. said that no part of his policy ever looked to a single section. His object had been to seek the good of the whole.

But the Senator from Mississippi tells us that if there has been a discrimination, it was made by me in the proposition to limit the right to purchase to actual settlers, at the reduced price. This he denied. His proposition applied to all the inhabitants of all the States who chose to emigrate and settle down on the public lands. His proposition was not limited to any part of the Union. It was offered to all the poor and indigent in all quarters of the Union. In regard to the resident proprietors in the new States, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, they had made enough out of the Government. In Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, immense fortunes had been made by the entry of lands after they had been five years in the market, and their subsequent sale.

Mr. C. concluded with some remarks in reply to the argument of Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, that the settlement enhanced the value of the remaining lands.

Mr. ROANE said, that throughout the whole discussion of this interesting subject, during the last session of Congress, he had contented himself with giving a silent vote against a bill similar to that now under consideration. He should have pursued the same course on the present occasion, but for the remarks which have fallen from the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER.] He rose to repel the idea that Virginia, in any part of her conduct, past or present, has ever manifested the slightest jealousy towards the new States, or the possibility that such a feeling can exist. He would furthermore inform that Senator, that whatever he might think of the desire of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] to excite the jealousy of the old States, especially Virginia, against the new ones, that it is far above the power of that eloquent Senator, even if he desired so to do, (which I am sure he does not,) or of any mortal man, to excite such a feeling. Virginia jealous of the new States! Why, sir, they are the flesh of her flesh, and blood of her blood. There has been no earthly cause for jealousy; there never can be any. It has always been her high pride to have contributed as much as she has done towards their birth and their growth. As long as the hardy and enterprising sons of Virginia left her barren or her exhausted soil, and for a moderate price purchased public land as rich as the banks of the Nile, their mother State had no other feeling than that of the gratification and pleasure at knowing, that whilst in the far West they had greatly bettered their own condition, they had, at the same time, contributed largely to the productive labor of the nation, and the best interests of all the States, for which she had made so many generous sacrifices, and for which only was the land ceded by her to the United States. She has had cause, sir, to enjoy more than this ordinary share of parental pleasure. Whilst looking through your legislative, executive, and judicial halls, in all time past and present, she has felt her bosom throb with pride and joy, at seeing her enterprising sons, from all the States and Territories to which they had migrated, sitting on their benches, and distinguished for their talents and their patriotism. Away, then, with the idea of the jealousy of Virginia of the growth and prosperity of her daughters and sisters of the West. As well might you talk about the jealousy of the home bee, of the sedulous laborers who range abroad, and return loaded with honey extracted from every flower of the forest, for the common benefit of the whole hive. As well might you talk of a jealousy of our hardy tars, who drive our noble merchantmen into every sea, and return to our ports freighted with the rich products of every clime. Sir, I oppose this bill, not from any feeling of jealousy, but because I do most conscientiously think it illegal and unjust. The land to which it relates was ceded for the common benefit of all the States. Here, sir, are the very words of the grant made by Virginia; and if the draughtsman of those articles of cession could have foreseen a purpose to divert these lands from the objects in contemplation, he could not have used stronger language. After making certain reservations, the articles of cession say, that all the remaining land "shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose; and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." These, sir, are the terms of the cession. Can words be stronger?—can language be plainer than this? But, sir, how has this "common fund" been disposed of? I will not now dwell upon the millions of acres which have been diverted from it to private and local purposes. As long, sir, as people would cross the Atlantic ocean, and buy the public lands at the very low price always demanded for them, the public good was greatly advanced, because we were, by that process, supplied with one of our greatest wants—population. As long as fertile public lands could be purchased at the Government price by our poor and enterprising citizens of the old States, the public interest was greatly promoted by improving the industry and increasing the wealth of the nation at large. But, sir, whenever the intention or the effect of any measure in regard to the public lands is to divert them from the purposes for which they were so obviously, and, in my opinion, so justly designed, or without adding one soul to the population of the United States, or one iota to their wealth, the effect is merely and only to transport people from the East to the West—yes, sir, to induce them to leave good lands and comfortable hearths, to settle on the "refuse lands" in the new States, merely to swell their population, for one will enter my dissent.

Mr. President, Virginia has been drained of much of her wealth and her population, and with it has gone many, very many of her men of enterprise, genius, and talent; but, sir, of this we have never complained, because, although it might be a local loss, it nevertheless contributed to the general good of the whole Union; and, sir, should that free and voluntary emigration to the fertile lands of the West continue till Virginia should become a deserted wilderness, there could be no just cause of complaint. What I do complain of is this, that a sponge should be applied to her surface, to take up from it every remaining soul, and to squeeze them out upon the "refuse lands," the pine barrens, and sand hills of the new States. That when there is no more public land worth cultivating left in the new States, a bounty should be offered to the inhabitants of the old ones to come and settle on their "refuse lands." But, Mr. President, I see that this bill takes care to permit all persons owning lands adjacent to the public lands, as well as the actual settler, to purchase a section (six hundred and forty acres) at the reduced price of seventy-five cents an acre, and goes on most carefully to provide, that after having purchased those six hundred and forty acres at that price, they may be at liberty to purchase as much more as they may choose; at the present Government price of $1 25 per acre; and, sir, it is not hazarding much to say that land that is not worth $1 25, is not worth seventy-five cents. The effect of this bill, if it passes, will be to enable the landholders contiguous to the public lands, to enlarge greatly their domains, at a very reduced price. It is an old saying, that poor land is not a safe friend, but an excellent neighbor. Sir, who that has a fertile tract of land which he wishes to bring into full cultivation, does not know the value of poor contiguous lands? He can well afford to pay a good price for them, whether his object be to keep off bad neighbors, to obtain water, fuel, timber, range, minerals, or anything else; even, sir, to swell his acres, and gratify his pride by enlarging his domain. In every possible view which I can take of this subject, not omitting that contained in the report of the Committee on Finance, and the accompanying letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have carefully read, I am constrained to vote against the amendment, and against the bill; and in so doing, I declare again, that I have no other interest or feeling than a settled conviction that they are in violation of law, justice, and equity.

Mr. President, I cannot resume my seat without expressing my sincere wish that this whole subject could, in some manner satisfactory and just to all, be withdrawn from the scope of our legislation. It is a delicate, intricate, and important subject. It is every day becoming more and more unpleasant; and sooner than that, which was intended by our forefathers as a bond of cement, and a fund of wealth to us all, should become a bitter apple of discord among friends and brethren, I for one am willing to vote for any measure which the united wisdom, justice, and patriotism of Congress may devise, to dispose, finally and forever of this subject, as one of national legislation. I would do this not because I have any material objection to our land system, but, sir, I would do it for peace, harmony, and friendship. But, Mr. President, until some such measure shall be adopted, I never will, whilst I retain a seat here, vote for laws in regard to this subject which neither my understanding nor my conscience can sanction.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Graduation Bill—Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Young, of Illinois.

SENATE.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1839.

The bill for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands came up as the special order, the question being on the amendment of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama; proposing to extend the privilege of purchasing at the reduced prices to contiguous landholders, to the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands, under the instructions of the Senate when the recommitment was ordered.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill. He thought that it was a premature measure. It proposed to reduce the price of refuse lands, but it would operate on all the public lands in market. There are upwards of seventy-one millions of acres now in market, and it is computed that not more than three millions of acres are annually required for settlement. How can these be called refuse lands, when there is twenty times the quantity brought into market than there is a demand for. He thought that its principal tendency would be to excite speculation in the public lands. A few years since, there were $20,000,000 invested, when the lands were held at $1 25 per acre, and this amount would be greatly exceeded were they reduced to seventy-five cents. By the provisions of the bill, the richest landholder would be placed upon an equal footing with the poorest occupant, which he could not assent to. He was also opposed to the bill on account of the discrimination made between citizens of the different States; he thought it invidious and unjust. The public lands are as much the property of Kentucky or Massachusetts as of the States in which they are situated. They are the common property of all the States of this Union, and we are merely trustees to manage it for the public benefit. He knew of no reason why a landholder in Alabama or Arkansas should have an exclusive privilege of purchasing at a reduced rate more than a landholder in Kentucky or Virginia. Mr. C. went into an elaborate argument to prove that his colleague [Mr. CLAY] was not an enemy of the new States, and referred to the whole course of his life to contradict the assertion. On the contrary, he had been denounced, in another section of the Union, as an enemy of the old States, and he supposed he was considered as hostis humani generis; but he was of opinion that some of the advocates of the measure were more anxious to fix this charge of enmity to the new States on his colleague than they were convinced of its truth, and he thought that the propriety or impropriety of passing the bill was not determined by the fact that his colleague was hostile or otherwise to the interests of the West. It was natural enough that Senators who represent those States that are seeking these exclusive privileges should, in their zeal, denounce those who may think it their duty to oppose them as enemies to the new States; but was it fair, was it generous? Suppose the old States should ask Congress for a donation of five millions of acres for the purposes of education or internal improvement, and that a bill for that purpose was brought forward in this body, their Senators would tell us that it was of great importance to their States that this bill should pass, and enlarge on the many advantages that would accrue to their States by its operation. What would Senators say if every one opposed to the passage of such a bill should be denounced as an enemy of the old States? yet it would be equally generous and just with the course pursued by the advocates of the measure before the Senate. We have already dealt liberally, very liberally, with the new States, and have made large donations to them for educational and other purposes. He trusted that the proposition of giving these lands away to citizens of the new States at twenty-five or fifty cents per acre less than to citizens of other portions of the Union would not be acceded to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Illinois, said, (in reply to Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky:) I rise not, Mr. President, for any purpose of crimination or recrimination, or to impugn the motives of any, on this or the other side of the Chamber, much less intentionally to misrepresent what may have been said by honorable Senators here, in relation to this all-absorbing subject of the public lands, of which we have heard so much at the past and present session of Congress. I have no feelings of ill will to gratify—no personal dislikes to induce an unkind expression towards any Senator who may have taken part in these discussions; but I desire, as a duty I owe to the people I represent, to defend them against unjust animadversion, and to put some things right in relation to the debate of the last and the present session, that they may know and judge for themselves who has, and who has not been misrepresented in respect to these debates, and the course which has been adopted and acted upon by honorable Senators here in opposition to the leading measures, which, whether well or ill directed, have from time to time been brought forward to facilitate the settlement, and expedite the growth of that interesting section of the country which stretches along the immense valley of the West. Much has been said, Mr. President, in the progress of the debate now going on, relative to the attitude assumed by the able Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] in reference to the inhabitants of the new States, who have settled upon the public lands; and as his honorable colleague [Mr. CRITTENDEN] has undertaken his defence against the charge of hostility to the West, denies that there is proof to sustain the accusation, and says that his colleague has been misrepresented by those who are determined to have him, noletis volens, an enemy to the new States, I will attempt to show, that although language may have been attributed to him which he did not use, some of which I have myself seen in the public prints, that still enough and more than enough remains to sustain all the material allegations that have been urged against him.

The Senator [Mr. CRITTENDEN] asks, why it is that his colleague [Mr. CLAY] has, alone of all others, been singled out as the object of vituperation by the friends of this measure; why the whole fountain of bitter waters has been poured out upon his devoted head; and why it is that he alone is to be offered up as a sacrifice upon the altar of western interests, for having done what he conceived to be his duty in respect to the greater interests of the whole Union. Sir, if the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] stands conspicuous as the object of attack in this debate, I would ask his honorable colleague, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] who placed him in that condition? Has he not, above all others, at all times, and upon all occasions, when the subject of the public lands has been the topic of discussion, taken the lead in denouncing these lawless intrusions upon the public domain, as he is pleased to term them? Has he not, in fact, to use his own expression, battled it for days together, "solitary" if not "alone," against our preemption and graduation bills, when scarcely a man of his party would venture to the rescue? These things considered, Mr. President, and how can it be matter of wonder or surprise to the Senator [Mr. CRITTENDEN] that his colleague should be met by the Senators from the new States, upon the ground he himself has seen fit to occupy, so far in advance of his associates, as to have left them almost entirely out of sight behind him. Mr. President, during the progress of the debate on the preemption bill at the last session of Congress, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] indulged in expressions towards the settlers of the new States who had gone upon the public lands for the purpose of procuring homes for themselves and families, which, in my opinion, they did not deserve; and as they were repeated on more than one occasion during the course of that protracted debate with the utmost deliberation, I took note of some of them at the time that they were uttered, in the precise terms employed by the speaker as I understood him; and as I wish to recur to these expressions, for the purpose of showing how far, in this respect, the honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] may or may not have been misrepresented, as is supposed by his honorable colleague, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] I will refer to them as I took them down, and leave the Senate to judge whether we of the new States, or the honorable Senator's colleague, has had the most cause to complain of misrepresentation. The honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] said, when discussing the merits of the preemption bill, and of those who were to be benefited by its provisions, in the debate of the 27th of January last, according to my memorandum, that he knew of no law or principle of propriety, which authorized us to give away the public lands as a bounty to the poor; as a bounty for a violation of the law; that he viewed it (the preemption bill) as a license to a set of lawless intruders to go upon the public domain, and prevent its sale in the manner prescribed by law; that he looked upon the whole system of preemptions as a system of boundless, heartless, scandalous, fraudulent speculation; that it was full of fraud, abominable, execrable fraud; a system that tainted, corrupted, and putrified every one who touched it; that these men (the settlers upon the public lands) might, with equal propriety, seize upon our forts and arsenals, our ships upon the ocean, or plunder the public money in the Treasury, and appropriate the spoils among them, as thus to seize upon the public domain, and hold it against the just demand of the Government.

Such, Mr. President, are some of the expressions in which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] indulged at the late session of Congress towards the settlers of the West.

But it is said that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has been misrepresented, intentionally misrepresented; and that language has been attributed to him on the occasion referred to which he never uttered. This, sir, to some extent, may be true. I have seen some newspaper reports of that debate which contained expressions which I do not remember to have heard in the terms supposed to have been employed; but the inferences drawn were, nevertheless, in most instances, correct logical deductions from the premises, as admitted to have been stated in the debate. As, for example, the Senator did not say in so many words that the settlers upon the public lands were pirates, but he did say that they might, with equal propriety, have seized upon our ships upon the ocean, and hold them against the lawful right of the nation, as thus to seize upon the public lands, and defeat, by unlawful combinations, a just competition at the public sales in the manner prescribed by law. And what is this but a charge of piracy? And what else is a man who commits an overt act of piracy, such as the Senator has described, but a pirate? He did not say that they were robbers, but he characterized them as robbers, by assimilating their supposed offenses to a seizure of the public forts and arsenals—to a plundering of the public Treasury; and what is this but robbery or larceny, according to the circumstance of force or no force, in despoiling the Government of its property?

Mr. President, we have a class of speculators I could mention, who are well known in the new States, who are, perhaps, justly obnoxious to the Senator's charge of piracy; but they are not the preemptioners, or the squatters on the public lands, who have gone there without injury to any one, for the purpose of providing homes for themselves and children, and who expect to pay a reasonable price for them as soon as they are brought into the market. No, sir, it is an antagonist interest. The land pirates I speak of are certain gentlemen who make it their trade to go about the country seeking whom they may devour—who visit this city, and the other cities of the Union, purchasing up adverse claims to land at a cheap rate, long since abandoned, and supposed to be worthless by their holders—buying up old musty patents, for ten or twenty dollars each, to lands that have been sold for taxes many years ago, and long since passed redemption; ay, dealing in all sorts of claims, which have color enough to alarm the fears of the bona fide settler, and force him, however reluctantly, to the alternative of an unjust compromise, or that which is infinitely worse, a course of ruinous litigation. Yes, Mr. President, in this way stripping the honest settler of his hard earnings, and exposing him anew to all the hardships and privations incident to the life of a squatter when he first enters upon the wilderness, and scarcely knows to-day on what he is to subsist to-morrow. Sir, so much was said to the disparagement of these settlers upon the public lands, that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] not now in his place, who had just before that time returned from an excursion to the West—who had seen them at their humble homes, and partaken of their hospitality, rude though it may have been, felt himself constrained to stand forward in their defense. He did defend them; and in the account he gave of them here in his place, he did them simple justice. Sir, I will say no more on this branch of the subject, except to add, without intending any disparagement by the comparison, that so far as intelligence, industry, and enterprise are concerned, that the people of Illinois possess these attributes in as high a degree as the people of Kentucky, or any of the old States; and that they would as long forbear from knowingly committing an offense against the laws of the Union as the Senator's constituents, or the constituents of any other gentleman upon this floor. No, sir; they never have believed that in going upon the public lands they thereby became lawless intruders, and despoilers of the public property; and our whole course of legislation, in reference to the settlements upon the public lands, since the year 1813, justifies them in this position.

I will now proceed to quote some passages from the Senate Journal of the last session in relation to the preemption bill, and see how far the honorable Senator's course is reconcilable with western interests, in proposing and voting for amendments which were evidently intended to embarrass the progress of the bill, and ultimately, if carried, to defeat its passage. There is something more in these amendments, Mr. President, than mere opposition to a measure of preemption, such as was proposed by the bill of the last session—some principles involved which I cannot subscribe to; an import and tendency on their face fraught with much mischief if they had been adopted. Hence I desire to speak of them, and expose, if I can, their deformities to the Senate and the people. On the 27th of January, 1838, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to grant preemption rights to settlers on the public lands. The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] proposed, as an amendment to the bill, the following proviso: "Provided, That the right of preemption granted by this act, or the act hereby revived, shall not accrue to any other persons than those who were, on the 1st day of December, 1837, citizens of the United States; and such citizenship shall in all cases be established by legal and competent testimony, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which the lands may lie, prior to any entry thereof by virtue of the provisions of this act."

On the yeas and nays being demanded by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENSON,] the following was the vote:

"For the amendment: Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, and Tipton—15.

"Against it: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—28."

Here, Mr. President, was a proposition to limit the benefits of the bill to native and naturalized citizens, to the exclusion of those who were foreigners but not naturalized; an attempt at a limitation on our land sales hitherto unknown under the different preemption laws passed for the benefit of the citizens of the new States, which, in my judgment, was both invidious and unjust. And for this the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] voted. Is this not hostility to the West? I, sir, will never consent to this distinction. Foreigners, Mr. President, are required by the constitution and laws of Illinois to work on the public highways, to perform militia duty, and to pay taxes for the support of the government; and they are permitted, in return, by the same constitution and laws, to purchase, hold, and enjoy real and other property; and afterwards transmit the same to heirs or assignees, by will or otherwise; and, after six months residence, (having become inhabitants of the State,) to vote at all elections; and this, sir, before naturalization. The discrimination attempted, so far, at least, as Illinois is concerned, was odious and unjust; and being unjust, I, as an Illinoisian, could not have done otherwise than to have opposed it as I did. And, sir, it met with a signal rebuke in the final, in the heavy vote that was cast against it.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] then proposed himself to amend the bill, by adding thereto the following section:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all settlements upon the public lands subsequent to the 1st day of December, 1837, shall be, and are hereby, strictly prohibited; and the President shall be, and hereby is, authorized and required to cause all persons who may settle on the public lands subsequent to the day aforesaid to be removed therefrom."

On the yeas and nays being ordered on the demand of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] the following was the vote:

"For the honorable Senator's amendment: Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Rugles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—21.

"Against it: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—23."

Here, sir, was a distinct proposition, not only strictly prohibiting all settlements upon the public lands after the 1st day of December, 1837, but requiring the President to cause such persons as might go upon them, to be forthwith removed, by a military force, I presume, if necessary. Is this not hostility to the West? Sir, shall it be said to the new States, now nine in number, in this great Confederacy of twenty-six independent sovereignties, that the lands within their limits shall not be settled until the pleasure of the old States, however long withheld; and that if our citizens should chance to go upon them, they are to be seized upon and removed by the strong arm of the Federal Government? No, sir; I deny this right of making the public domain, as it is called, subject-matter of revenue, to the prejudice of the settlement of the States in which it may be situated.

And here, sir, permit me to avail myself of the authority of an extract from the able and conclusive speech, delivered before the General Assembly of Virginia, by the honorable Senator, [Mr. CLAY,] on opening the Kentucky mission on the 14th of February, 1822, in a case in point. The extract is taken from the Richmond Enquirer, and relates to a difficulty at that time existing between the States of Virginia and Kentucky, growing out of the early settlements in Kentucky, in which many of the citizens of the latter State had, either through mistake or defect of title, settled upon lands, which afterwards, on investigation, turned out to belong to citizens of Virginia, and from which suits had been instituted in many instances to eject them. In relation to the right and duty of a State not to permit large tracts of land to lie waste and uncultivated within its limits, the honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] said, that "of all the attributes of sovereignty, scarcely any can be deemed more essential than that of adopting a policy to redeem a wilderness and render it productive. That it was not merely the right but the duty of a State to advance its own prosperity by the enactment of wholesome and equitable laws, demanded by its peculiar condition." Had it not been for the settlement and improvement of the country, he contended "that the lands which composed the rich virgin earth of Kentucky would have been untended, her fields unplowed, the theater of a yet doubtful and dreadful war, waged between civilized and savage man; the silence of her luxuriant forests disturbed by no other sound than the horrible war-whoop, and the shriek of innocent females, and the cries of helpless children, expiring under the agonies of the tomahawk and the scalping-knife."

Such, sir, was the eloquent appeal of the honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] in behalf of the suffering squatters of Kentucky, in that day of trial and tribulation which, in the course of unforeseen events, had come upon them. I wish, Mr. President, that we of the "far West" had such an advocate at this time upon this floor. What might we not anticipate from the energy and eloquence of one who could thus enter into all the feelings, the sympathies, the privations, and the sufferings of the early adventurers to the West?

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] has said that, in his judgment, it was unwise policy in the General Government to bring these lands into market faster than they could be disposed of and settled; that emigrants ought not to be permitted to run over large tracts of unappropriated land in pursuit of lands more distant, so long as any of that already offered, or any considerable portion of it, should remain the property of the Government. Sir, this is making this great question one solely of revenue, a question of dollars and cents to the old States, regardless of the rights of the new. Suppose, Mr. President, the policy suggested and advocated by the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] had been adopted at the early settlement of the State of Ohio, where now would be the flourishing States of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and the more distant Arkansas? What, sir, would the Delegates from Wisconsin and Iowa, in the other wing of this Capitol, say to such a system of policy? Ay, sir, what would the people who sent them here say? Territories, Mr. President, whose population and improvement have advanced with a rapidity altogether beyond the most extravagant computation, and which will, in a very short time, if suffered to pursue untrammelled the high road which is opening up before them to wealth and political distinction, have a just right to demand admittance into the Union upon a footing in all respects equal to the other States of the Confederacy. No, sir, it is not merely the right, but it is the duty of the new States to see that such a system of restrictive policy is not fastened upon them, under any pretext, by the old States; to see that the settlement and improvement of the lands within their limits enter into the consideration of adjustment, as well as the matter of revenue, whether collected for the ordinary purposes of the Government, or distribution among the States, as proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. Mr. President, the reasons why the people of the West object to the proposed plan of distribution, so far as I know them, are, because it creates an invidious distinction between the old and the new States; they are unwilling that the new States should become as so many plantations to the old States, rendering an annual rent or other periodical return of the money arising from the sales of the lands within their limits, and which is taken from their pockets for purposes not contemplated in the cessions of these lands to the General Government; and lastly for the stronger and more important consideration, that they do not desire to see a separate moneyed interest in this way, created for the benefit of the old States, having no public lands within their limits, which must inevitably tend to excite the cupidity of their citizens, and make this great question as to the proper disposition of the public domain, a question purely of revenue, and of increased prices, for the purposes of distribution, so long as an acre shall remain in the market unsold. In opposition to the higher interest of the new States, in reference to the settlement and improvement of the country by making donations, when proper, in aid of great works of internal improvement; such as the improvement of our navigable rivers; the construction of roads and canals; the draining of swamp lands, so as to render them healthy and fit for settlement and cultivation; the erection of colleges and other institutions of learning for the education of our youth; by giving the right of preemption to actual settlers; by reducing the price from time to time, as the best lands are taken up; and in the end, and in a reasonable time, by a surrender of the unsalable lands unconditionally to the States in which they lie.

These, Mr. President, are some of the reasons, apart from the power to tax these lands, which induce most of us from the West to oppose the gilded scheme of distributions among the States, which has been presented to the Senate under such an alluring aspect, that scarcely the new States themselves could resist the temptation. In my judgment, sir, it is far better for the new States that the avails of the public lands should come into the common fund, and be applied to the common purposes of the whole Union; and if we must continue to beg for favors and indulgences to our citizens, let us rather apply to Congress, as we have done, than be thrown upon either the charity or liberality of the Legislatures of the States.

But, sir, I have one more matter in relation to the preemption bill of the last session, of which I intended to speak, and I shall be done with that part of the subject. Towards the close of the debate, and just before the vote upon the engrossment for the third and last reading was taken, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. PRENTISS] proposed the following amendment by way of addition to the bill:

"Nor shall any person have any right, or be entitled to a patent, under, or by virtue of this act, without paying, in addition to the statute minimum price, at least one half of the real value of the land above that price, not including improvements, to be ascertained by three judicious and disinterested appraisers, under oath, to be appointed by the register of the land office in the district where the land is situated."

On the yeas and nays being demanded, the following was the vote:

"For the amendment: Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Southard, and Spence—10.

"Against it: Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—27."

Here, Mr. President, was a direct proposition to compel the settler to pay an increased price over and above the price of $1 25 per acre as the price of his preemption, according to a value to be assessed at the time of entry, or to submit to the alternative of being turned away from his home, for the benefit of some fortunate speculator who might be willing to pay an increased price for his improvement; and for this proposition, also, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] voted. Is this not hostility to western interests? I would ask the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PRENTISS,] who brought it forward, as well as those by whom it was advocated, if these lands are valuable, who made them so? Were they thus valuable in their wild uncultivated state, or have they been made so by the labor and enterprise of those who went upon them and incorporated their labor with the soil? And, sir, upon this subject, again allow me to recur to the honorable Senator's Richmond speech, for arguments much better, and conveyed in language far more eloquent and convincing than any at my command. The honorable Senator, [Mr. CLAY,] when speaking of the difference between land in its wild and improved state, said:

"Land, before it is improved, may be compared to the raw material, with its improvements, to a fabricated article. A farm with all its fields, its houses, orchards, gardens, lawns, and shrubberies, no more resembles the same land in its native state, before these various improvements are put upon it, than a piece of Brussels lace does the flax out of which it is wrought. And would it not be monstrous to say to the innocent possessor and manufacturer of a raw material, that he should surrender the article, uncompensated for his labor and expense?"

In respect to the rule which he contended should prevail as to the value of the land, he further said: "Not to go into other codes, what is the provision made by the laws of our common ancestors in the Colony of Virginia, when its condition bore a faint resemblance to that of Kentucky?" Here Mr. CLAY quoted several laws of the Colony of Virginia, passed nearly two centuries ago, providing that the true owner should compensate the settler of land. He contended that they were more unfavorable to the true owner than the laws of Kentucky, because the first of them compensated even the squatter; none of them gave rents; and, although all of them secured to the true owner the election to take the land and improvements, upon paying the value of seating, to be assessed by a jury, or the value of the land without the improvements, the land to be valued at the time of seating, not that of assessment.

Here, then, Mr. President, we have a practical illustration of the true rule of assessment, furnished by the experience of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and backed by the high authority of the colonial laws of Virginia, from whom we derive the greater part of this vast public domain, some of which were passed near two centuries ago. And yet the Senator votes for the proposition to compel the settlers of the new States to pay according to an assessment to be made at the time of the entry, and not according to the value at the time they first went upon the land. So much, sir, for the preemption bill of the last session, and of the misrepresentation of the honorable Senator's course in regard to it, and other kindred measures.

I come now, sir, to submit a few remarks in reference to the bill under discussion. It has been said that the provisions of the bill propose to unsettle our whole land system. What does it propose, sir? Simply to reduce the price of such lands as have been in market at private entry for five years, and remain unsold, to one dollar per acre; and such as have been in market for ten years and upwards, under the like circumstances, to seventy-five cents per acre; and the operation of the bill limited to five years. How does this unsettle the land system? Was not the price of the public lands reduced from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents, the present minimum price of the Government in 1820; and has this reduction tended to weaken and destroy the system? Surely not. On the contrary, it has been found, upon experience, beneficial, in a high degree, to all the parties concerned—both the Government here, and the people who have purchased at the reduced price. How, then, does the proposition now submitted, for a still further reduction, differ in principle from the reduction which took place at the time that I have mentioned? Sir, such has been the policy of all the States, as far as I have understood, having waste lands within their limits, and such, in my opinion, is the just policy of the General Government towards the new States. As, for example, in the State of Illinois, a large tract of land, known as the "Gallatin county Saline Reserve," was ceded to the State for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of salt. In process of time many of the works were abandoned by the lessees of the State as unprofitable, and much of the land became unnecessary for the purpose of the grant. In this condition of things the Legislature of the State applied to Congress for its assent to the sale of a large portion of these lands, (fifty thousand acres,) and consent was given without any restriction as to the price for which they should be sold. Some of them were good, none I believe first rate, but by far the greater proportion was of inferior quality. Well, sir, what is the result? It was in the first instance, I believe, offered at a dollar per acre, and a part of it went off; then at seventy-five cents, when the next best portions were sold, and the residue again became unsalable; and now by the law of 1833 the price is reduced to fifty cents per acre, and still a considerable part remains undisposed of, and must await another reduction. How is it in Kentucky, the Senator's [Mr. CRITTENDEN's] own State? Some years ago, Mr. President, I had occasion to visit that part of Kentucky which lies south of the Tennessee river, where the State at that time owned a considerable quantity of the unsalable lands, which were then in market, as I was informed, at fifty cents per acre, and that in Commonwealth paper, which was depreciated so as only to be worth about two for one; making the cash value of the land but twenty-five cents per acre; and to-day I was informed by a gentleman from that part of the country that the present minimum price was but twelve and a half cents per acre—reduced in a few years, Mr. President, from fifty cents to but one fourth of that sum. I mention these cases to show, sir, what the policy of the States has been in respect to their waste lands that have been some time in market. Sir, it is their policy to sell them that they may be settled; that they may be taxed to support the Government; and that the country may be cultivated and improved; for, in proportion to private wealth is the wealth of a State, and its condition as to revenue improved and benefited. Of all the attributes of sovereignty, Mr. President, none is so essential to the well-being of a State as the taxing power; for, without money, sir, the wheels of Government must stop; the Government itself would stop and come to an end. Is it right, therefore, that large tracts of land in the new States should be either kept out of market or held up at prices which they could not command, in a reasonable time, purely as a matter of revenue? No, sir, it is the right of the new States; and the duty of the old, to see that these lands are settled, to see that no impediment is thrown in the way of their prosperity, if that be the tendency, under any pretext whatever.

Sir, much has been said of the parental care of the old States in providing and maintaining this excellent land system for the benefit of the new States, and of the immense emigration to the West, within a recent period, under its benign influence. Sir, I have nothing to object to the system; I agree that it is a very good one; as good a one, perhaps, as could have been devised; but that was not all that created this immense rush to our borders. No, sir, the panics have done much within a few years past to add to that emigration. What was the process, sir? Why, Mr. President, I have either read it in the newspapers, or have been informed in some other way, that during some of these panics at the East and North, thousands of laborers have been dismissed from employment by the wealthy manufacturers in a week, sometimes in a day—turned out of house and home to beg for bread for themselves and their suffering families. Yes, sir, hardy, industrious laborers, who were in the habit of working day by day for their bread, were in this way suddenly made beggars. Well, Mr. President, they must do something; they turn their eyes to the West; the next you hear of them is at Buffalo, crowding your steamboats to overflowing, and bound for Detroit, and from thence many of them to Chicago, in Illinois. Yes, sir, in this way thousands find their way to our borders, and the next thing you hear of your manufacturer of the East, he is an independent squatter of the West, comfortably settled down upon the public lands, and talking about preemptions.

It has been said, Mr. President, that the quantity of refuse and unsalable lands in the new States has been greatly exaggerated. It may be so, sir. I will only speak for Illinois what I know, Mr. President, from long experience and personal observation. Many of the lands intended to be embraced by this bill, Mr. President, (I admit there are exceptions,) are either too poor and unproductive to be desirable for cultivation, or are, from other causes, unfit for present use, and therefore unsalable at the present minimum price of the Government. Such, sir, are large waste tracts of prairie land, remote from timber, and lands that are subject to occasional inundations, or are otherwise too wet for successful cultivation. I will give you an instance, sir. One of my colleagues of the other House [Mr. CASEY] told me this morning that a case had been brought before the Illinois Assembly, now sitting, to induce action here, for sectionizing a township of land on the

SENATE.

Embarrass rivers, around which the exterior town-ship lines only had been run by the Government surveyor, and the land returned as subject to inundation, and consequently unfit for cultivation, so that it might be occupied, and in some way rendered productive. Now, sir, will any man say, although this may be rich bottom land, that it is worth the price for which the public lands are ordinarily sold? Surely not, sir; for although it may be reclaimed to a considerable extent for a variety of purposes, still money and labor must be expended to render it thus valuable for any purpose whatever. So it is with prairie lands in general: that are distant from timber. If you expect to sell them, you must reduce the price, so as to afford the inducement to purchase to such as are not able to buy the better lands, and would be willing to encounter the inconveniences attending these remote situations on account of the difference in the price. And, sir, one reduction should follow another within reasonable periods until the whole is disposed of.

But we are told, Mr. President, that we have had ample donations for the establishment and maintenance of institutions of learning, colleges, seminaries, and common schools, for the purpose of constructing roads and canals, for our seats of government, and many other purposes; and we are emphatically asked what we have given in return for all these advantages. I will answer, Mr. President, as to some things, that Illinois, at least, has given in return. In the first place she exempted from taxation, for three years, several millions of acres which had been patented as bounties to the soldiers of the late war; and in the second all the lands for five years, amounting to many millions more than have been sold since the 1st day of January, 1819. Our tax on a quarter section of land, in Illinois, Mr. President, is two dollars and forty cents for ordinary purposes; and one dollar and twenty cents for the opening and repairing of roads, making three dollars and sixty cents in the whole, on each one hundred and sixty acres of land. Now, sir, let any man make the calculation, and he will find that this would amount to no inconsiderable sum. But, sir, appeals have been made to the old States, to the Senators from Virginia and Pennsylvania, here in their places, to resist the monstrous pretensions of the new States, that "we of the old States are required to submit to." Sir, I trust that these appeals will not have the effect of arraying the old States against us; but that they will agree with us, that it is the right of the new States, as well as it is the duty of the old, to see that these lands are disposed of, and settled in a reasonable time, and that no impediment is thrown in the way of the occupation of the lands within our limits, and the cultivation and improvement, by our hardy and enterprising citizens, of the whole country, good, bad, and indifferent, upon such terms as shall be just, liberal, and equitable, to all the parties concerned.

Still, Mr. President, I am willing to do the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] the justice to say, that with all his opposition to our land measures, and harsh expressions towards our citizens, to say the least of them, that he has rendered important services to the West. Yes, sir, he has for many years stood forward a prominent advocate for that great western measure, (the Cumberland road,) in which we of the West are so much interested, and I give him full credit for it. I have seen the monument on this side of Wheeling, said to have been erected in commemoration of these services, and I hope it may long stand there. I, at least, will not be among those to pull it down. I only regret, sir, that some of our southern friends, agreeing with us on most other questions of national policy, cannot find it within their constitutional competency so to act on this all-important question to many of the States, as to build up similar monuments to their memory and their fame, that should endure as long as this "GREAT HIGHWAY OF THE WEST," which was commenced under the auspices of Mr. Jefferson, and continued down to the present day, under the successive administrations of Madison, Monroe, Adams, Jackson, and the present incumbent, Mr. Van Buren, shall stand itself as a monument, in the estimation of the admiring beholder, to the memory of those distinguished personages I have mentioned, and all those who shall stand firmly by it to the end, in the day of its trial and its difficulty.

These, Mr. President, are my views in regard to the feelings and interests of the people I represent, in respect to this important measure of the reduction of the price of the public lands. And as to their patriotism under all circumstances, whether we shall succeed or not, I will only add, in the language of a worthy predecessor, who once occupied this seat, [the lamented Kane,] that "if that time shall ever come, which God forbid, when the sun of your liberty must set, it will set in the West, unsullied by a single act upon your borders to sever this great and happy Confederacy."

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he must beg the indulgence of the Senate to enable him to place himself rectus in curia. The Senator from Kentucky who last addressed us, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] (he said,) had entirely misconceived him, as he seemed to suppose that he (Mr. C.) had imputed hostility on the part of the people of Kentucky towards those of the new States. Nothing could be further from him. He said he had never imputed, nor intended to be understood as imputing, any unkind feeling whatever on the part of the Senator's constituents towards his own, or the inhabitants of any of the other States interested in the passage of this bill. On the contrary, (Mr. C. said,) he had the best feelings towards the mass of the people of Kentucky, whom he had ever regarded as distinguished for their intelligence, patriotism, courage, and liberality. Nor have I imputed hostility to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] who last addressed us, nor to any other Senator, merely because he may have opposed or voted against this and other measures of interest to the new States. No, sir, far be it from me to regard as an enemy any honorable member of either House, merely because he may differ in opinion with me on any subject, or vote against and oppose, by any fair and ordinary means, such measures as I may approve and support. Nor do I regard the honorable Senator's colleague [Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky] as "hostis humani generis." I know his colleague is not an enemy of the whole human race. I know full well he is friendly to some classes of men, and that however unfriendly he may be to the settlers on the public land, or to the humble cultivator of the soil; however opposed to this measure, and so far as I am able to judge, to all other measures favorable to the new States, he is, nevertheless, the friend of certain privileged classes, the friend of banks and banking corporations, and the friend of manufacturers, monopolists, and speculators. While other Senators had opposed this and some other measures interesting to the new States, the honorable Senator's colleague, [Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky,] so far as he recollected, had opposed all such measures indiscriminately. His opposition had been universal, active, persevering, and untiring. He knew no measure desirable to the new States which he had not opposed.

But, sir, (said Mr. C.) let us go back to the real question involved in the motion to amend—it is simply whether you will permit the settler now in the new States, who owns and cultivates adjoining lands, to enter the inferior lands embraced by the bill, at the reduced prices? In reference to this question, the honorable Senator [Mr. CRITTENDEN] says, as did his honorable colleague yesterday, that he can see no reason for giving such a preference to a man living in the new States, any more than to those in the old States, and that he will never agree to it. And, pray, Mr. President, whose fault is it that any such discrimination whatever is to be made? There was no such feature in the original bill. Under its provisions, the right of entry at the reduced prices was open to all the citizens of the United States; nay, sir, open to all the world. As we have stated, over and over again, the friends of the bill sought not only to give homes on reasonable terms to all who stood in need of them, but to fill up the new States with an honest, hardy, and industrious population. The provisions of the bill, as originally brought forward, were calculated to effectuate both these objects. But, sir, the Senator's colleague, [Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky,] not content with these broad and liberal provisions, moved its recommitment, with instructions to confine the privilege of purchasing at the reduced prices to actual settlers, as well as to limit the quantity, agreeing, however, finally to leave the restriction as to quantity blank. Well, sir, the committee, in strict conformity with the instructions, reported the bill with such limitations, but thought proper to propose to amend the report, by extending the privilege also to the owners and cultivators of adjoining lands. The Senator was for confining the privilege to actual settlers alone, which was certainly a discrimination in favor of that class; but the moment the committee propose to extend the privilege to another class—owners and cultivators of adjoining lands—he cries out against the discrimination as odious and unjust, and appeals to the Senators from Virginia and Pennsylvania by name, and to those of the old States generally, to join him in resisting and defeating the proposition! It will do very well for that Senator to propose and urge a distinction in favor of one class, but it is monstrous for the committee to move to embrace another class!

Sir, is there no reason for giving the proposed privilege of entry, at the reduced prices, to those who are now settled in the new States, and owning and cultivating lands adjoining? He thought there was. He asked, were not this class pioneers in the settlement and improvement of the country? Had they not gone into the wilderness, and encountered all the hardships and privations invariably incident to such enterprises? Had they not, he asked, in many instances, also encountered the dangers of the savage tomahawk and scalping knife? Yes, (he said,) they had done all this, and they had opened roads, built bridges, erected churches, and school-houses, and had thus facilitated and accelerated the sales of the public domain; and could the gentleman see no merit in these services, and no reason to extend the privilege of entering a limited quantity of the refuse lands to complete the settlements they had begun? But, sir, the Senator says it will be extending a privilege to the wealthy planter of the southwest—the man of large possessions. Although, in some instances, men of this description might profit under the provision, he would beg the gentleman to recollect that it was not the good fortune of all to be wealthy in that quarter. There were poor men, and those of moderate property there, as well as elsewhere. He wished it were otherwise, and that every one of his constituents possessed, at least, a competency. He said there were many men in the new States whose means had been too limited to purchase more than a quarter section, or in some instances eighty acres; that the families of such settlers had increased in numbers and wants, and now it was necessary to cultivate the whole of the original purchase. Would Senators refuse to such an individual the privilege of extending his possessions, at the reduced prices, when neither the settler, nor any one else, had considered the adjoining land worth $1 25, though it had been subject to entry at that price for five, or, perhaps, for ten, fifteen, or twenty years? He could not think so till the vote was given.

But, sir, (said Mr. C.) the Senator from Kentucky farthest from me, [Mr. CLAY,] complains that the committee did not conform to the instructions, by reporting a limit to the quantity to be entered under the bill. This, sir, is a strange objection. Although the Senator proposed a limitation, in the first instance, did he not agree to strike it out, and leave a blank? And is there not a restriction in the original bill to one section? Certainly there is; and the committee, deeming that the proper limitation, reported the bill back without changing it. Would the Senator have had the committee to perpetrate a tautology, by repeating, in the amendment reported, the precise limitation which was already in the bill? If he would, he was certainly very unreasonable. Then, sir, after all, there is nothing so monstrous or inconsistent in the report of the committee. The amendment they propose is a fair subject for the deliberation of the Senate. If they approve it, as we hope and believe they will, they will give it the sanction of their votes; if they disapprove it, they can but reject it, and we must submit.

But, sir, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has referred us triumphantly to his bill, introduced some years ago, "to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States"—more familiarly called his distribution bill—as conclusive evidence of his friendly regard for the interest and prosperity of the new States. The Senator seems to deplore the failure of that measure, and to feel no little astonishment that it did not conciliate our approbation.

Sir, I can assure the honorable Senator that, so far as I have the means of judging, it was more universally condemned by the citizens of the States in which the public lands lie, than any other measure affecting their interest which was ever proposed. He said some opinion of the estimation in which it was held, might be formed when the fact was known, (as he believed it to exist,) that on the passage of that bill through the House of Representatives, in March, 1833, there were but three votes given in its favor from all the new States. It must be presumed (he said) that the immediate representatives of the people of those States knew public sentiment in their respective districts; and that they voted in accordance with it generally; and, if so, how strong was this evidence of their reprobation! Yet the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] not only persisted in maintaining that that measure was favorable to their interest and welfare, but pertinaciously endeavored, session after session, to force it upon them by the votes of the representatives of the old States. The mass of every intelligent community is generally competent to form a correct opinion upon matters which concern their own interests; but the Senator from Kentucky would not admit the capacity of the citizens of the new States to judge of the probable effects of the measure he proposed, but assumed the right to judge for them.

Sir, regarding the probable effects of that measure; it might have been much more properly given the title of "a bill to divide out the new States amongst the old ones," than that which was given it by its author. The bill was reported by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] not from the Committee on the Public Lands, but from the Committee on Manufactures; and it was much better adapted to the interest of manufacturers than that of agriculturists. Its tendency was to render the acquisition of land by the laboring classes more difficult, and consequently to force them into other employment than agriculture—into the manufacturing establishments of large capitalists in the States east of the Alleghany mountains, to obtain the slender means of subsisting their families. Yes, sir, its tendency was to enhance the price of the public lands, and to keep it up, so that they would have been attainable only by the rich, to whom the poor would necessarily have become an humble and dependent tenantry.

Why, sir, instead of a common interest in a common fund to be derived from the sale of the public lands, and paid into the general treasury, to be disbursed for the general benefit, each State was to be allotted a separate and distinct share and interest. To render the plan more imposing and seductive, a table was appended to the report with this caption: "Statement showing the dividend of each State (according to its Federal population) in the proceeds of the public lands, after deducting therefrom fifteen per cent. as an additional dividend for the several States in which the public land is situated." As the basis of the calculation, the proceeds were estimated at $3,000,000 annually—then about the highest amount that had ever been received in any one year. This table exhibited, to each State, at a glance, the amount she was to receive from this source annually. For example, (omitting fractions,) it showed to New York that she would be entitled to $410,000; to Pennsylvania, that she would be entitled to $288,000; to Virginia that she would be entitled to $218,000; to North Carolina, that she would receive $136,000; to Massachusetts, that she would receive $130,000, &c., &c. Sir, this exhibition was very alluring to State cupidity; too much so to be resisted by some of them, at least. Why, sir, if I am not very much mistaken, the dividend which would have fallen to several of the States, would have amounted to as much, or more than the total amount of their expenditures for the support of their respective State governments. They would have had no need of taxation for any State purpose, if left to the free appropriation of the money. How naturally would they have learned to rely on this Government for the means of support; and, having become accustomed to it, how unwilling would they have been ever to part with such a reliance. And, sir, the necessary result of this separate interest would have been to induce the older States to resist every attempt to reduce the price of the public lands, however inferior in quality—ay, and to stimulate them, extort from the inhabitants of the new ones the highest possible prices, and every dollar they could raise. Would the older States have been willing to have extended any liberality to the new ones, under such circumstances? Would they have been willing to grant the right of preemption to settlers, who had improved the value of new lands? Or, would they not rather have raised the price, in order to increase the amount of their dividends? For the answers to these questions, I need only refer you to the ordinary impulses of human nature. No, sir, so far from reducing the price of inferior lands, we should, more probably, have had the price of unimproved lands increased by graduation to higher rates than the existing minimum; we should, perhaps, have first had it offered at five or ten dollars, as the minimum, for those of the best quality, and at corresponding rates for those of the second or third quality. The population of the new States would thus have been retarded, and when their numbers had increased beyond the capacity of the lands owned by individuals to support them, they would have been compelled to purchase at the increased and exorbitant prices, or driven to seek new homes in other regions.

Sir, we have heard something said recently about subsidizing the States, and bringing them to the footstool of Federal power. What more effectual mode of bringing about this result, than to have accustomed the States to look to the Federal Treasury for money to supply their wants? Would not the tendency have been inevitably to make the General Government the tax-gatherer for those of the State? Would not the State governments have leaned insensibly upon this to fill their treasuries? And would not such a system, beyond any other that could be devised, have led to render the States insignificant, and to concentrate all power in this Government? Yes, sir, in my opinion, no other plan of consolidation, which has ever been suggested, or deprecated, would be more insidious, more dangerous, or ultimately more fatal to our free institutions, than for this Government to be allowed to collect and distribute revenue amongst the States. If the States could be induced to become dependent on the General Government, by any system of policy, this would most assuredly have brought it about.

But, sir, this is not all. The distribution bill of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] involved a violation of the compacts under which the public domain was ceded by the States to the General Government. Congress had repeatedly urged upon the States having western territory to cede it to the General Government, as well to promote the harmony of the Union, as to aid in the payment of the national debt which had grown out of the war of the Revolution. The several States having western lands finally yielded to these appeals; but upon express conditions, which were assented to by the General Government. No State ceded so large a territory as Virginia; and she expressly stipulated that the proceeds should be "a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the States as had become, or should become, members of the Confederation," &c. Georgia used substantially the same language; and a clause followed, in each act of cession, that the lands ceded should be "faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." These are the terms of the compacts, for the performance of which the faith of this Government is pledged. The proceeds are to be a "common fund," for the use and benefit of the whole Union—not for each, nor any of the States separately. Nor could this fund be legitimately expended, except upon objects within the constitutional power of this Government.

Now, sir, where do you find in the Constitution the power of Congress to appropriate money from the common Treasury to such objects as were contemplated by the Senator's distribution bill? It provided that the distributive shares of the several States should be applied, by their respective Legislatures, to "objects of education, internal improvement, colonization of free persons of color, or the reimbursement of any existing debt contracted for internal improvement" before the passage of the bill.

The question arises, could Congress make appropriations for such objects directly out of the Treasury? Where will you find the power to appropriate money for purposes of education? Where is the power of Congress to appropriate money to build a national university, or colleges, or academies? If any opinion in favor of the exercise of such a power was ever entertained, it has been long since abandoned. The only clause in the Constitution that has the remotest relation to the subject is that "To promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." And here the manner of promoting the progress of science and useful arts is specifically laid down, not by appropriating or granting money, but by giving to authors and inventors, for limited times, the exclusive benefit of their labors. It cannot be pretended, even with plausibility, that Congress can constitutionally make a direct appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States for the purposes of education. Is there any distinction to be found in the Constitution between that portion of the treasure of the nation derived from taxes or customs, and that derived from the public lands as to the power of appropriation? Is it not all one common fund, intended for common and general purposes? On what ground can it be denied?

In regard to internal improvement, the provision of the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, was without restriction or limitation. It did not limit the power of the several Legislatures even to the debatable class of national improvements, or those which would facilitate the national defense, or advance the general interests of the nation. The whole fund might have been applied to objects of a character strictly local. Then, waiving the question for the present, whether improvements of a national character be within the competency of the General Government, it cannot be maintained that the provision under consideration was constitutional in this point of view. But to make the objection still more conclusive, the latter part of the clause authorized the application of the money by the State Legislatures to the "reimbursement of any existing debt contracted for internal improvement." What kind of internal improvement? Any kind; that which was merely local, as well as any other.

But, sir, the most objectionable of all the objects contemplated for the application of the funds to be distributed remains to be noticed: it was for the "colonization of free persons of color." This clause of the provision involved consequences more serious and alarming than all the others. It was but the first step towards the assumption of a power in this Government, of all others the most dangerous to the interest, peace, and stability of the Union. Where in the Constitution is to be found the power of Congress to appropriate money for the colonization of free persons of color? Would it not be as easy to find a power to legislate in reference to another class of our colored population? Yes, sir; and whenever Congress shall undertake to legislate in behalf of free persons of color, it will be but the first step, the entering wedge, towards rendering this Union asunder.

Well, sir, it cannot be pretended that Congress could make a direct appropriation of money out of the Treasury for any of the objects specified in the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Kentucky. Could they do it indirectly with any more propriety? Would it be more allowable or excusable for Congress to cause the money to be handed over to the State authorities, under an express injunction to apply it to the same unconstitutional objects? or would it alter the case to anticipate or intercept the receipt of the money into the Treasury of the United States, by a law for its transfer to the States in advance? No, sir; certainly no man will be so disingenuous as to attempt to escape or evade the restraints of the Constitution by any such quibble. If Congress could not appropriate the money directly to the purposes of education, of internal improvement, or the colonization of free persons of color, they could not do it indirectly, through the agency of the States; the one would be an infraction of the Constitution as palpable as the other. Nor does the Constitution make any distinction between the revenue derived from the sale of the public lands and that derived from other sources. It is all a common fund, a common treasure, for national and general purposes, and for State and local purposes.

I will here take occasion to say, (said Mr. C.,) that I am opposed to a distribution of the funds of the nation amongst the States in every form yet proposed, or of which I can conceive. Hence, (he said,) he would be opposed to a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands amongst the States, with or without the specification of the objects to which they were to be applied, because he believed Congress possessed no power to make such a distribution, and because the tendency of such a policy would be to destroy the independent character of the States, and to concentrate all power in this Government.

Under such views as he had expressed, Mr. C. said he could never agree that the bill, which was intended to distribute the net proceeds of the public land amongst the several States, was favorable in its bearings upon the interests of the new States or in its probable effects upon the Government of the Union. Whilst it would have been most highly injurious to the peculiar interests of the new States, its inevitable tendency was to corrupt and degrade all the States, and through the unrestrained distribution of money amongst them, by this Government, to augment its already great powers to an illimitable and ruinous extent.

Mr. TIPTON observed that he did not rise to prolong the debate; but as his position on a former occasion did not seem to be understood, he thought it right to make a brief explanation. He would just state how it happened that he made any remarks with regard to the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, which he did not hear. When the preemption bill was under discussion at the last session, he was absent for a short time in a committee room, preparing a bill, and when he returned to his seat in the Senate, the Senator from Kentucky was reading from a newspaper. He (Mr. T.) inquired of a friend what was going on, and was told the Senator from Kentucky was reading a newspaper published in Indiana, and he has been saying harsh things of your constituents. The next day he took an opportunity to reply to the remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky; defending the squatters on the public lands, and quoted the words which he was informed the Senator from Kentucky had used. A few days after this the Senator from Kentucky called his attention to a report of his (Mr. T.'s) speech, as published in the newspapers, and stated that he did not use the words there attributed to him. He repeated words which he said he used on the occasion referred to. I adopted his own words, and they were published in the pamphlet copy of my speech. If these are the words now quoted by the Senator from Illinois—and I believe they are—they are the very words furnished by the member from Kentucky. He surely has no just grounds to complain of these words being now repeated. Now, from what had been said to-day, it might be inferred that I used words in my speech which I retracted next day; but the fact is, that I had nothing to do with the correction, but to tell the truth. When a thing was said or done here, I have no other object than to let the truth go to the people concerning it.

GRADUATION BILL.

REMARKS OF HON. JAMES BUCHANAN, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN SENATE, January 17, 1839.

On the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, to reduce the price of the Public Lands which had been subject to private entry for fifteen years, in favor of actual settlers, in limited quantities, at fifty, seventy-five, and one hundred cents per acre; and to distribute the proceeds of all the Public Lands among the several States, after the 1st day of July, 1840.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it was very far from his intention, on the present occasion, to follow the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] throughout the whole course of his argument. He had risen more for the purpose of defining his own position in relation to this question, than of attempting to enlighten the opinions of other Senators.

He could not help congratulating the country and the Senate that the Senator from Kentucky had just expressed his concurrence in opinion with the illustrious individual at the Hermitage, in regard to the propriety of selling small tracts of the public lands to actual settlers at reduced prices. When two such high authorities united, he supposed the question might almost be considered as settled. The extremes had met in favor of this principle; and, in his opinion, a wiser, more just, or more politic principle in regard to the disposition of the public lands could not be established, provided it were confined within safe and proper limits. From his very first entrance into public life up till the present moment, he had ever entertained the opinion, that the man who first went into the wilderness and felled the forest ought to be regarded with peculiar favor. Such a man, who, by the sweat of his brow, had provided a home for himself and his family, would rear up children endowed with the frank and manly virtues which were the firmest support of republican institutions. Whilst encouraging such actual settlers, we were acting in the best manner to promote our interests as proprietors of the public land. Every improvement made by an actual settler added value to all the surrounding lands, and enabled the Government to sell them the more speedily at the standard price.

Peculiar reasons now existed why we should encourage the settlement of the country on the extreme western limits of the States and Territory beyond the Mississippi. It had been our policy to remove all the Indians from the States, and settle them immediately beyond our extreme western frontier. There these warlike, restless, and discontented savages were brought together in great numbers. Now what stronger barrier could we raise against their hostile incursions, than to people this frontier with a bold and hardy race of actual settlers, accustomed to the toils and perils of the remote wilderness? Such a population might prevent war, and if war should come, would save us the effusion of much human blood, and millions of money, in conducting it. The wisest nations of antiquity had always acted upon the same principle. It was the policy of the Romans to send military colonies to their frontiers, to be a barrier against the incursions of the barbarians.

Whilst these were his fixed convictions, he could not forget the interest of his own immediate constituents in the public lands; and if this bill proposed, as the bill of the last session had done, to graduate the price of the public lands in favor of all persons, it should again have encountered his opposition. But it was now strictly confined to actual settlers; and no actual settler could acquire a patent under it to more than half a section of land, and not even to that, until he had established, by clear proof, that he had settled, improved, and cultivated it, according to the terms and spirit of the law, although he was obliged to pay the purchase-money in advance. In favor of such a settler, the bill reduced the price of that portion of the public land which had been in the market and remained unsold for more than five years, from $1 25 to $1 per acre; and such of this land as had remained unsold for more than ten years, to seventy-five cents per acre. In order that we might fairly test the practical operation of this measure before we made it a permanent law of the land, the bill had been amended, on his motion, so as to limit it to the period of five years. Before the expiration of this term the subject would again be brought before Congress, and we could then act with all the lights of experience. He could not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, because he thought that it went too far in reducing the price of any portion of the public lands to fifty cents per acre, although it might have been fifteen years in market without finding a purchaser. It was too long a stride to go down at once from $1 25 to fifty cents per acre.

The bill, amended as it has been, will prevent fraud in the most effectual manner, because self-interest will present no temptation to the commission of fraud. It had often been urged, as an argument against the preemption system, that speculators under it hired individuals to become settlers upon lands before they were offered at public sale; that the choicest and most valuable tracts were granted to those individuals as actual settlers at the minimum price, instead of being exposed to public sale, and were then immediately conveyed to the speculators. He did not doubt that, in some cases, such had been the fact. In regard to the actual settlers for whom this bill provides, no such objection could exist. No speculator would be such a fool as to incur the expense of employing an individual to make an actual settlement on a tract of three hundred and twenty acres of land, for the purpose of procuring it at one dollar per acre, and then wait for the title until the settlement had actually been made, when he could go at any moment to the land office, and obtain a title for it immediately at $1 25 per acre. The difference of price would only be $80 on a half section which had remained unsold for five years, and $160 if it had remained unsold for ten years. The cost of employing an individual to make a settlement would be greater, in either case, than the reduction of price. Besides, the speculator always pounces upon the best portions of the land immediately after it is brought into market. He seeks not the lands for whom no person was found as a purchaser during periods of five and ten years. This provision, then, will be almost exclusively confined to poor men, who are not able to pay the present prices for a quarter or a half quarter section of land, and who are willing to provide themselves a home upon the less valuable public lands, at a small reduction from the present prices. It opens no door for speculation and fraud.

Now, sir, if we were to judge from the discussion upon this question, we might consider it one of vast importance, calculated in its consequences to shake the whole land system of the country; but view it as truth presents it, and we find it to be a very small affair. What is this land system as it at present exists? The public lands are surveyed, and are then exposed to public sale; but these sales have ever been so managed that they have brought but a fraction more than the minimum price of $1 25 per acre. After these public sales, all the residue of the land is subject to be entered at any time, by any individual, at $1 25 per acre; and there are now more than seventy millions of acres in this condition. The best lands are always the first selected; whilst their settlement and improvement give additional value to those which remain of an inferior quality. These inferior lands in succession come into demand, and are sold at the same rate. This progress, however, has been so slow, that, notwithstanding the rage for speculation which existed for some years previous to the late suspension of specie payments, we still have on hand more than seventy millions of acres subject to private entry. This bill will only operate upon such of these lands as have been in market for five or for ten years, without finding a purchaser; and, in its present form, can produce but little effect, one way or the other, upon the public revenue.

On this land system, for a number of years past, the principle of preemption has been ingrafted, which means nothing more than that the pioneers of civilization, who go into the wilderness in advance of the public sales, shall be permitted to purchase, in exclusion of all other people, the small tracts of land on which they have settled, at $1 25 per acre. In other words, that the speculators who attend the public sales shall not be permitted to purchase these poor men out of house and home, and thus convert to their own benefit the toil and the danger which they have endured, in erecting cabins and cultivating spots of ground beyond the limits of civilization, to shelter and support themselves and their families. This bill proposes to ingraft another, though a similar, principle upon the land system. It proposes to sell to the poor settler, in small quantities, such of the public lands as have remained unsold for more than five or ten years, at a reduction of price, in the first case, of twenty-five cents, and, in the last, of fifty cents per acre. This trifling boon, if such it may be considered, will not affect the general system. It is a small departure from it, in favor of a meritorious class, which time and circumstances, and the condition of the new States, have rendered necessary. It is one which we should most cheerfully grant; and he felt perfectly convinced that his constituents would never condemn him for giving such a vote. Whilst these were his sentiments in regard to this particular matter, he was by no means prepared at the present moment to unsettle the settled policy of the Government in regard to the general disposition and sale of the public lands.

Mr. B. should now proceed to make some remarks in regard to that portion of the Senator's amendment which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the public lands, after the 1st day of July, 1840, among the several States. At an early period of his congressional career, he had been friendly to a similar measure. When the Senator had last brought forward his distribution bill, he (Mr. B.) had voted for it, though he was then acting under instructions from the Legislature of Pennsylvania. It was, however, proper, to say that he never would have been the agent in giving such a vote, had he deemed the measure to be unconstitutional. Such had not then been his opinion, nor was it so now. Should this measure hereafter be pressed, at a period when our finances were in a condition to render the revenue derived from the public lands unnecessary for the support of the Government, he would decide upon the question, as it might then be presented, under all the existing circumstances. At the present moment, he was decidedly opposed to the Senator's amendment. Our revenue was now scarcely sufficient, with the utmost economy, to meet our expenditures. There were still eight millions of outstanding Treasury notes, which must shortly be redeemed. The Florida war, which was such a fruitful source of expenditure, had not yet been terminated. He might enumerate other causes of extraordinary expenditure. He asked, was this a moment to pass a bill which would deprive the Government of the revenue derived from the public lands? He would never consent to place the Administration and the country in such a dilemma. The Senator seemed to be aware of this difficulty; and, in order to overcome it, had expressed the opinion that before July, 1840, the revenue derived from customs would be sufficient of itself for our expenditures, without the aid of the public lands. He was sorry that he could not entertain the same opinion. We all know that, under the compromise act, the rate of duties imposed on foreign imports was sinking every two years. Was this a moment, then, when our expenses must be necessarily great, to lop off the revenue derived from the public lands, and give it away to the States? He thought not. He firmly believed that, if this measure should be adopted, we must either create a national debt or increase the tariff. But the Senator says, let us pass the bill now, and if, at the first session of the next Congress, it should be found necessary, we can then suspend or repeal the act. Now, for himself, he believed it to be the part of wisdom to wait until the finances of the country were in such a condition as to justify the withdrawal of the proceeds of the public lands from the public Treasury, before we should take the question into serious consideration. It would be miserable policy to spend time in enacting a law at this session, which we had reason to believe we might be compelled to repeal at the very next session; and that, more especially, as the Senator did not propose that his distribution should take effect until the 1st day of July, 1840. In any view of the case, there was no propriety in acting upon the subject at the present session of Congress; and if the attempt were persisted in, it would only consume important time, and prevent us from passing other laws of pressing necessity.

The Senator says that the expenditures of this Government have increased enormously, and unless the Administration should use more economy, an increase of the tariff would be inevitable. He had heard the same declaration over and over again on this floor, from Opposition Senators, since the commencement of the present session. It was the easiest thing in the world to make general charges of wasteful expenditure, and by comparing the aggregate amount of expenditures for the last few years with that of former times, to present a plausible statement for the purpose of alarming the fears of the people. But, do we not all know the causes of this increased expenditure? We have had to prosecute a most expensive war in Florida; and is there any man in the country who would say that this war ought to be arrested; that the United States ought to cower before the prowess of the Seminole Indians, and that the frontier should be exposed to their merciless depredations for the sake of saving money? This war, then, has been one source of increased expense. Another cause which greatly increased the aggregate amount of our expenditure for the last few years was the vast sums of money which, in our liberal policy, we had paid for the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within the different States. Who regrets this? Who would not now pursue the same course under the same circumstances? And yet all this expenditure has been charged to the extravagance of the present Administration. He had seen estimates of the gross amount annually expended by this Administration, which, strange as it may seem, actually included as an item of their extravagance the millions of indemnities which the late Administration had procured from foreign nations for American merchants. These had first been paid into the Treasury, and were afterwards paid out to those entitled to receive them under the different treaties; and these very disbursements were one item to swell the apparent aggregate of the account current against the Administration, and to prove that it was a most extravagant Administration. The money collected from foreign Governments, by the vigorous and successful diplomacy of General Jackson, was thus used for the purpose of proving a charge of profligate extravagance against his successor.

If the Senator desires to test the question whether he or I are the most economical, I am ready for the trial. Let him point to any single expenditure which can, with justice to the country, be reduced; and if I shall not go as far as he will, then he may brand me with the charge of wasteful extravagance. Will he reduce the Army? Are twelve thousand men too great an army for a nation of fifteen millions of people?

[Here Mr. CLAY said it was, and that he would reduce it.]

Mr. B. resumed. Twelve thousand men too numerous, with a sea-coast stretching from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and thence to the Sabine, with the Florida war on hand to the South, and Indian hostilities threatened along our whole western border, and with the task of preserving our neutral relations throughout the whole extent of our Canada frontier! Reduce the Army, with an inland boundary of thousands and thousands of miles, and without any certainty that war may not rage along its whole extent before the end of another year! Why, sir, a sufficient number of men are scarcely left on the sea-board, I will not say to garrison our fortifications, but merely to take care of them, and keep up the police necessary for their preservation. Why, it is a subject of astonishment for the whole world that our Army is so small. Now, sir, I do not believe that the Senator himself, after a moment's reflection, would reduce the Army below twelve thousand men; and if he did, I feel confident that, great as is his influence here, he could not find four Senators of the whole body to sustain him in the attempt. Then, if the expenditures for the Army cannot be lessened, would the Senator wish to reduce the Navy, which is the pride and the best defense of the nation from foreign aggression? Have we too many vessels of war, or are there too many of them in commission for the protection of our commerce? I think the Senator will not answer in the affirmative. The Army and Navy are notoriously the chief causes of our permanent expenditure; and if they cannot be reduced, is it not unjust to charge the Administration with extravagance in maintaining them? But the Senator complains that the expenses of our civil list at the origin of the Government did not exceed $600,000; and now they have greatly increased. He might as well complain that the coat, which was sufficient to cover a child in its infancy, was not large enough for the same purpose after it had grown to the dimensions of a giant. Since then we have doubled the number of States of the Union, and quadrupled our population, and extended in every form our foreign and domestic relations; and yet the Senator would have us expend no more money on the civil list than in the days of our infancy. Now, economy was a homely virtue. It did not deal in generals, but in particulars. It saved wherever it could. One of the most extravagant men he had ever known was one of the most powerful preachers of economy in the general. If the Senator can neither reduce the Army, nor the Navy, nor the number of those employed in civil service, then I would ask him to lay his hand upon any abuses which may exist in either service. Let him (said Mr. B.) descend from generals to particulars, and I shall go with him. Let him point to any individual instance of extravagance, with which the Administration is fairly chargeable, and I will unite with him in condemning and correcting it. Till this shall be done, these general charges amount to nothing.

Mr. B. said that in regard to the allowance of private claims, he was one of those who had subjected himself to the charge of illiberality for having scrutinized them with too much severity. As an individual, he might be, and he trusted he was, sufficiently liberal with his own money; but he did not feel that he had a right to give away that of the people. He was, therefore, prepared to unite with the Senator in exposing and correcting every extravagance in the administration of the Government. All he wanted was the ability to discover this extravagance.

To return to the subject, he did not think this was a propitious moment to make any general and radical change in our land system, such as the Senator proposed. We were now approaching the close of the last session of a long and stormy Congress; and its few remaining weeks could be better, much better, employed than in discussing the amendment, which it was morally certain could not become a law before its termination. The bill proposed no change in the system, but merely that of giving to actual settlers the right of purchasing, in limited quantities, at a small reduction of price, lands which had been refused by other purchasers for periods of five and ten years; and to the resident owners of lands in the new States, the same limited right of purchasing such vacant lands, provided any such adjoining their present tracts. Whilst he should cheerfully vote for the bill, he would vote with equal cheerfulness against the Senator's amendment.

GRADUATION BILL.

REMARKS OF HON. W. S. FULTON,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN SENATE, January 9, 1839,

On the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the Public Lands, the question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands, granting the right of purchase at the reduced prices to owners of contiguous lands.

Mr. FULTON observed that the discussion which the bill had undergone, had been a matter of great surprise to him, particularly as a graduation bill had passed this body at the last session, after the most ample examination and consideration. It was not to have been anticipated by those who then so ardently and feelingly supported the rights and interests of the settlers in the new States, that they should again, at this session, have to encounter such determined opposition. This discussion had shed much light upon the subject, but he thought, instead of proving that the measure was inexpedient, it had proved it to be one of great national importance. He did not, however, pretend to blame Senators for the course which they felt it to be their duty to pursue. He feared that many Senators believed that those who represented the new States on that floor, were constantly endeavoring to impose upon Congress, and to get hold of the public lands, without being willing to pay a just and adequate consideration for them. The violent opposition which all measures having for their object a relaxation of the rigid terms imposed by existing laws upon the enterprising portion of our population, who are seeking homes in the new States, and which had greatly retarded the sale and settlement of the public lands, had convinced him that the true situation of those lands which have been offered for sale is not understood by the people of the old States, and that the Senators from the new States are suspected of attempting to practice deception upon Congress in all the measures which it is their duty to bring forward upon this subject.

Mr. F. did not believe that a single Senator could be found who would be willing to oppose the bill under consideration, if he really believed that its provisions would operate exclusively upon refuse lands, such lands as were in reality not worth, in their wild state, the minimum price of the public lands; and yet such was the true state of the case, at least in the southwest, in regard to lands which had been for some years in the market. He would not deny that millions of acres of lands, which had been offered for sale for a number of years, had sold within the last three years at the minimum price. The document, so conclusive as it was thought to be in refutation of the argument that the lands in market ought to be reduced in price, after having failed to find a purchaser for a number of years, presented this morning by the Senator from Maryland, and which went to prove that, even within the last year, three fourths of the land that had been sold was land which had been some time in market could, as he thought, be very easily explained. It was the result of the land mania of 1835-'36. During those years, such was the spirit of speculation in the public lands that all the new States were thoroughly explored and examined; individuals were employed, who went in companies through all the public lands that were open to entry; and every foot of land of any value was marked and noted, and scarcely an acre which the speculators supposed would, even in some years to come, bring over $1 25, was permitted to remain unentered. So generally was this the case throughout the southwest, and particularly in the cotton region, that he felt confident that of the lands already in the market in all that region, a very few hundred acres indeed could now be found that would be considered worth $1 25 per acre. This universal sweep of all the valuable lands in the southwestern States had extended (he said) also over the northwestern States; and the only difference was, that the remaining lands in those States were, perhaps, not so entirely sterile and valueless as those remaining in the southwestern States. All our valuable cotton lands have been taken up, and all that now remained were such lands as would be valuable only for timber or fuel, or for range. The provision of the bill then under consideration, and which was intended to authorize the present landholders of the new States to enter lands adjoining their plantations, would be highly valuable to the citizens of the State from which he came. There were vast prairies, fit only for grazing purposes, and uplands covered with timber, but without fertility, with here and there a few acres of second or third-rate soil; and then, again, extensive sandy pine barrens, or impenetrable swamps, all of them covered a portion of the year, and many of them throughout the year, with water. These lands could never be settled; they would never sell at any price, at least the great body of them. When, however, they adjoined good lands, as was in some instances the case, the owners of improvements would be willing to purchase, at a reduced price, such portions of them as they might find useful for various purposes connected with their agricultural pursuits.

It was from a hope of making a portion of these lands subject to taxation, and in that way aid in the support of our State government, that he was anxious to have the inducement held out to the citizens of his State to become the owners of a portion of such lands as he had described. He felt convinced that in the State of Arkansas, of the lands that had been for a time in market, all the cotton lands had been appropriated. Indeed, he knew that many of the speculators in land had purchased up, in their eagerness to appropriate all the good lands, hundreds of sections of very inferior quality; and he had heard that many of them were now anxious to sell, even for less than they had themselves paid for the land. He was sure that those speculators who had purchased hundreds of thousands of acres—as many had done since 1834, and who, in some instances, entered many sections lying together—must have bought a fair proportion of inferior lands; at least such, he thought, could not fail to be the case in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas. This attempt of the land speculators to purchase up all the valuable public lands in the market, is what has caused so many millions of acres of lands that were subject to sale to be purchased; and it is owing to the same circumstance that, even during the last year, a larger proportion of the public lands already in market were sold, than of those then just offered for sale. He honestly believed that throughout the southwest nearly every acre of good land had been purchased up, and was now in the hands of speculators. He thought he had fairly accounted, and in a way, too, which was calculated to satisfy the Senate, that of the lands now in market, nearly all must be really and truly refuse lands; for the apparently strange circumstance which the document exhibited that morning had presented, namely, that a greater portion of lands which had remained unnotified for years, had been recently sold, than of those lands which had just come into market. He would add another view. The speculators and their explorers were the only persons who had a knowledge of the whole country; and they cared not to make their purchases when the lands were first offered for sale, unless, indeed, they were then filling up and settling. It was only when they began to settle rapidly that the speculators came forward and make their entries; founded upon the knowledge they obtained of the quality of whole tracts of country. In this way, sometimes, valuable lands were permitted to remain unentered for a few years. This, however, was not the case to any extent in the cotton region. Their good lands were so much sought for, and there was so large a proportion of the lands that were unfit for cultivation, that nearly every acre of good land was bought when first brought into market. He admitted that this might not be the case to the same extent in the northwestern States and Territories; but if it were true that some good lands already in market in that quarter yet remained unsold, was that a reason why the southwestern States should be doomed to suffer, or be deprived of a population who might be induced to remain or remove into those States, if their inferior or refuse lands could be purchased at a reduced and proper price? He, therefore, thought that time was now a fair test of the value of the lands in market.

The limitation as to quantity proposed by the bill, completely cut off all inducement to speculation. No man would avail himself of the provisions of this act as a means of investing his capital. It will be confined in its operation almost exclusively to individuals who are making new settlements for themselves, or who wish to acquire a title to lands adjoining their present possessions. It is argued that a portion of the wild lands now considered of little value, will be, in time, from the progress of improvement, worth at least the minimum price. Admit this may be true to some extent, yet is it fair for this Government to keep down the prosperity of the new States, by holding up her public lands until the citizens of the new States, by their labor and expenditures, have added to their value, so as to bring up to them the price at which alone she is willing to sell them? Why will this policy be persisted in, when, if these very lands were now sold at reduced prices, the interest on the amount obtained for them would bring them up nearly to the minimum price, provided they were not sold in ten or fifteen years?

He said that without great expense, and the employment of a host of agents, it would be difficult to ascertain the true value of each tract of the public lands; and although the length of time that a tract had been in market might not be in all instances a certain test of its value, yet he thought it as fair a one as a just Government, anxious for the welfare of her people, ought to desire. If it failed in some instances, it would prove correct in hundreds of others; and, considering the serious objections which existed to the establishment of any other criterion, he could not but think that it was as satisfactory as we ought to desire.

It was said that not more than two or three millions of acres were required annually for agricultural purposes; that we have seventy millions already in market, and over two hundred millions yet to come into market within our organized States and Territories; and that the reason why the lands offered have not been sold, is because they are not needed by our population. This argument is altogether delusive. If the valuable lands in the new States could have been acquired upon the same terms as they are obtained for in other countries, the present population of the new States would have been doubled at least. Who (he asked) would be willing to remain upon worn-out lands, if he could possess himself of fresh land, at such a rate as to justify the expense of removing some hundreds of miles to a new country? The flourishing republic now springing up upon the southern border of Arkansas would not have drawn off such a population of native Americans, if the public lands could have been obtained upon the same terms in their own country. The very fact that so many American citizens had sought a home in that country, proved that the policy maintained so rigidly by this Government had prevented the settlement of an equal number of acres within the States of the Confederacy. It had forced thousands of valuable citizens to expatriate themselves. At least as much more land as those citizens required, and are now the owners of in Texas, could have been disposed of, if the terms of sale had been such as to have induced them to settle in their own country, instead of seeking a home in a foreign land. The population to the south and southwest had reached their limits; and, unless some inducement is held out to American citizens, who find it necessary to leave their old homes to settle in those States, they will continue to seek homes in foreign countries. So long, also, as the best lands are to be purchased at $1 25 per acre, the inferior lands will not sell at all at that price. The effect, therefore, of holding them up at the same price is, in fact, to prevent their being sold, and made subject to taxation; it prevents them from being settled upon at all; deprives the new States of a population which they would otherwise obtain, calculated to aid in advancing their prosperity, adding to their resources, and increasing their means of carrying on improvements, and leading directly to the development of their riches and glory.

From the strenuous opposition which has been made to this bill, it would be considered by most persons who were unacquainted with the subject, that the object of the Senators from the new States was to obtain the public lands for nothing; whereas the ultimate reduction to seventy-five cents per acre was not so great as that made upon the sales of all the public lands when the minimum price was fixed at two dollars. What is the present criterion by which all the public lands are set down to be worth only $1 25 per acre? Simply the fact of their failing to sell for more than that sum at public auction. May not all the arguments used against the graduation of the price of the refuse lands be urged with equal force against this criterion of value now fixed as the minimum? The truth is, if the Government is willing to let the refuse lands become private property upon any terms, the only means by which it can ever be accomplished is to sell them, after having remained so many years unsold, as to prove that they will not command the present minimum at lower prices than those at which the good lands are sold. This has been the policy pursued by the States owning public lands, and ought to be adopted by the United States. It is the only way to dispose of refuse lands.

This bill was emphatically the poor man's bill; and although the individual who now owned lands would be enabled to add to them a half section at the reduced prices if the provision then under consideration was adopted, yet the great object and purpose of the bill was to enable those who could not afford to purchase the public land at the present minimum, to buy a home at such a price, or upon such terms, as their limited means justified. The members of the Committee on the Public Lands who supported this bill, had been extremely anxious to bring down the lands which had been fifteen years in the market to fifty cents per acre. He had desired the adoption of this provision more than any other. But the Senators from the old States, who were willing to reduce the price of the public lands gradually, had objected most positively to a reduction below seventy-five cents at this time; and although these Senators would go with the Senators from the new States to that point, they were prepared to vote against the whole bill if this reduction was at this time insisted on. He had, therefore, with the other Senators from the new States, consented to give up that provision of the bill, hoping, however, that when the effect of the present bill was ascertained, and, as he believed it would be found to do, to enable the Government to sell much of the public lands that could not otherwise be sold, that then he hoped Congress would consent to reduce the price still further, and would be willing to bring down the lands remaining unsold for a number of years, to fifty, twenty-five, and even twelve and a half cents per acre.

It is objected that this measure will unsettle the price of land throughout the country. This was a great mistake. The first cost of wild lands had no influence upon the price of improved lands or of lands in a settled country. It has been said here, that all the public lands, after they are improved, run up to ten, fifteen, and twenty dollars an acre. If this is true, what effect, he would ask, would a reduction of twenty-five or fifty cents in first cost of the land, have upon lands selling at those prices? None whatever. The Government has no desire to speculate in lands, and ought not to wish to avail itself of the proceeds of the labor and expenditures of her citizens, after they have done so much towards clearing and cultivating their lands, and opening the country. It should have a fixed price for wild land of first quality, and lower prices for her second, third, and fourth-rate lands. No better plan than that now proposed can be adopted for attaining this object. This principle should be ingrafted upon our system; and now that our population had extended nearly in all directions to our limits, (for he did not take into view the unoccupied country towards and beyond the Rocky mountains, at present given up to the Indian tribes,) he thought this was the proper time to make this change in the land system, unless, indeed, we wish to drive the people to seek homes in foreign countries. The objections to the bill had been already so ably answered, and its details so fully discussed, that he would not go into the subject further. He hoped that as this was a measure of vital importance to the new States, and was at the same time so just and reasonable, it would meet the sanction of the Senate.

WISCONSIN CONTESTED ELECTION.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE.

January 5, 1839.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, asked leave to present a resolution, which was read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Hon. GEORGE W. JONES, late Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, is not entitled to his mileage and per diem allowance for his attendance at the present session.

Mr. WISE objected; whereupon

Mr. MASON said as it was a matter of some importance, he would move that the rules be suspended; and upon which motion, he called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER stated that he had received a communication upon the subject from Mr. Jones, and would prefer that the House would come to some decision upon it. He then laid before the House the following letters, which were read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 4, 1839.

SIR: I take this mode of informing you that a resolution will, at the earliest opportunity, be introduced to this House, denying your right to receive any compensation as Delegate to the present session of Congress.

I am, sir, with respect, your obedient servant,
J. R. GIDDINGS.

HON. GEORGE W. JONES, Washington City.

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C.,
January 5, 1839.

SIR: Considering myself entitled, under the usages of the House, and the laws of the United States, to receive my mileage and per diem compensation as the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, I received from the Sergeant-at-Arms, on the 20th ultimo, a check on the Bank of Washington for my mileage and per diem allowance up to that date.

Having received last evening the accompanying communication from a member of the House, Hon. J. R. GIDDINGS, of Ohio, and not feeling willing to retain in my hands the compensation alluded to unless most clearly so entitled, I respectfully return to the House, through you, the original check, to be canceled by the House, if in their judgment I am not entitled to it.

I came here under the solemn conviction that I was the rightful Delegate of the people of Wisconsin, to serve them here as such until the 4th of March next. This opinion was strengthened by the advice of able counsel, before and since my arrival here. I entertain the same opinion still, but will submit to the decision of the House in both cases without a murmur.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. W. JONES.

HON. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER, with the permission of the House, made a brief explanation of the course of the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Presiding Officer of the House.

By the Journal of the extra session, at the opening of the present Congress, in September, 1837, it appeared that "George Wallace Jones appeared as the Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, was sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and took a seat in the House." No certificates of election of members or Delegates were presented at the time of qualification, and the Speaker could not know under what authority they took their seats. Mr. Jones was sworn, and took a seat.

At the commencement of the present session, Mr. Jones appeared in his seat, claiming to be the rightful sitting Delegate from Wisconsin. When the claim of Mr. Doty was presented, Mr. Jones rose in his place and asserted his right. The House by its acquiescence, recognized him as the sitting Delegate, and took order in the case, by referring the claim to a seat as the Delegate from Wisconsin to the Committee of Elections. Mr. Jones continued in his seat as the sitting Delegate. He, at various times, as the Journal shows, presented petitions and resolutions, and participated in the business of the House as the sitting Delegate. This was permitted by the acquiescence of the House, until the right to the seat was decided by the House. Whilst Mr. Jones was thus the sitting Delegate, in his seat, in discharge of his duties as such, the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Presiding Officer had no right or power to inquire whether he was rightfully there. That was a question which the House alone could decide. The law regulating the pay of members and Delegates, for aught that appeared on the record, entitled him to his compensation until the time he was ousted by a vote of the House. He called for his compensation, and neither the Sergeant-at-Arms nor the Speaker had any discretion to refuse it under the law. The check for his compensation was made out in the usual way, by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and signed under the law. Since taking the chair this morning, the letter from Mr. Jones had been laid on his table. And now the question of compensation, under the resolution before the House, was an open one. The House alone can, by its order, refuse the compensation. Under the law, the Sergeant-at-Arms and Speaker cannot. The Speaker expressed the hope that the House would decide the question, and thus relieve the subject from all doubt and embarrassment.

Mr. MASON, after some introductory remarks, proceeded to review the circumstances under which Mr. Jones claimed his compensation. He stated that Mr. J. had returned to Wisconsin, and had thrown himself upon the suffrages of the people at the late election, when he was defeated by the election of Mr. Doty; who, as a matter of course, came on and claimed his seat. But, notwithstanding that, Mr. Jones had also come on, claiming to serve for the present session; although he knew that Mr. Doty had the certificate of election from the Governor of the Territory.

Mr. M. then referred to former cases of contested elections, and more particularly to those of Moore and Newland, to show that the compensation to unsuccessful claimants had been allowed on entirely different grounds; there being, in those instances, a dispute as to who had been legally elected; whereas, in the present case, there was no demur to the fact of Mr. Doty having been elected by the people of Wisconsin at the recent election. He contended that Mr. Jones had not the slightest ground to claim a seat for a third session; and that to allow him his mileage and per diem allowance would be establishing a bad precedent. He hoped the House would not allow the claim, especially as the sitting Delegate must be allowed the same. He maintained that there was no more ground for Mr. Jones to claim the compensation than there would be for ex-members of Congress to demand pay for the ensuing session after their term of service had expired.

After some remarks from Mr. BOULDIN against the resolution,

Mr. BRONSON said he believed it had been the invariable practice of the House, in all cases of contested elections, to pay the expenses of both claimants. He asked the House to consider the effect of disallowing such claims, until the question was settled as to which was legally entitled to the seat. Mr. Jones had come on under an honest conviction, supported by high legal advice, that he had a right to sit during the present session; the House had received and recognized him as such; and until it was decided otherwise, he was constitutionally entitled to his compensation as such, the Presiding Officer having no right to call in question the claim. He (Mr. B.) denied that this was a clear case, and that Mr. Jones had no right to come. The case was far from being clear, so much so that for some time the committee was much perplexed about the proper construction of the law relating to the elections of Wisconsin. He considered that, under the circumstances, Mr. Jones, or any other gentleman, was perfectly justifiable in asserting his claim to a seat for the present session. He was sure that no good lawyer could be found who would say that it was a clear case; and, as in his opinion, Mr. Jones had strong grounds for making this claim, he felt bound to vote for his compensation.

Mr. WISE said he should vote in favor of allowing to Mr. Jones his pay, as it was the duty of the House so to do. That gentleman was the prima facie Delegate from Wisconsin; and, under those circumstances, neither the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Speaker, nor any one else, had a right to deny that Mr. Jones was entitled to his money. Until the House decided otherwise, he was the constitutional representative of that Territory, and as such entitled to the usual remuneration for his services. The Speaker and Sergeant-at-Arms had properly performed their duty, under the circumstances, in granting to Mr. Jones the check for his per diem and mileage. He (Mr. W.) was sure that all parties would be gratified at the very honorable manner in which Mr. Jones had acted on the occasion. Had he chosen to retain the money, there was no law by which the House could compel him to return it; but Mr. Jones, actuated by that honorable feeling which influenced his other actions, promptly returned the check on the first intimation that his right to it would be questioned, and submitted his claim to the decision of the House. It was impossible for the House to refuse the money without a violation of former precedents, and deciding, also, that Mr. Jones had made a wanton claim, without color or reason. And should it decide that Mr. Jones had made a wanton claim, in what condition would it place the twenty-five honorable members, who voted in favor of the claim of Mr. Jones to his seat? Mr. W. then went on to show that, so far from the claim being wanton, it was founded upon a strong case; so much so, that previous to the remarks from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. THOMAS], he himself had been in doubt as to whether Mr. Jones was not legally and constitutionally entitled to a seat for the present session. He adverted to former cases of contested elections, and especially the case of Messrs. Prentiss and Word, at the late session, to show that it had been the invariable rule to allow the unsuccessful claimants their mileage and per diem allowance up to the time the decision of the House was given. He drew a glowing picture of the public abuses which would be the result of a refusal of the House to pay the expenses of unsuccessful competitors for seats, and showed, in that case, how very easy it would be for a rich nabob to triumph over a poor but legally elected member, as few men of the latter class would venture to press even a rightful claim, if they knew that, in case they were ousted by the House, they would have to bear their own expenses. Mr. W. concluded by again urging, that as the House had received and recognized Mr. Jones as the sitting Delegate, until its recent decision, he had a right to demand and receive his mileage and per diem allowance, and that no officer of the House had any right to withhold it from him, or to question his right to receive it.

Mr. THOMAS was sure the House would decide that Mr. Jones was entitled to the money, if they would but reflect on the circumstances under which that gentleman claimed his seat. Mr. T. then recapitulated the reasons which had, on a former day, induced him to support a claim of Mr. Jones to his seat, and maintained that, in every view of the case, the House was bound to remunerate him for the time of his service at the past session.

Mr. GIDDINGS said that as his name had been mentioned in the communication read by the Clerk, he would explain the manner in which he became connected with the subject now under discussion. After the vote of the House on the right of Mr. Jones to a seat, made upon a former day, I felt it important that a precedent should not be set of allowing any gentleman for travel and per diem compensation, who should attempt to hold an office beyond the term allowed by the Constitution and laws. It was rumored that Mr. Jones had drawn his pay, and I conversed with older and more experienced members upon the subject of introducing a resolution declarative of the views which the House entertains. All felt delicate, and each appeared willing to be excused. I felt unwilling that Mr. Jones should take nearly two thousand dollars from the Treasury without the color of claim, as I believed; and I then concluded to bring in a resolution myself. I felt it was due to General Jones that he should be informed in regard to my determination, and therefore sent him the note which has produced the response just read from the Speaker's table. I am, however, happy to find the subject in abler hands—in the care of one who will do it justice. [Mr. MASON had introduced the resolution.]

The overwhelming vote given by the House on the right of Mr. Jones to hold his seat, will save me the trouble of going into the merits of the question then pending. It is sufficient to say that that decision was on solemn argument, with a full House; and that a decision thus made ought to set at rest the subject of right between Messrs. Jones and Doty. This principle, if admitted, disposes also of the principal portion of the argument of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. THOMAS]. Mr. Jones, then, must rest his claim for compensation, either upon legal right, or some equitable and meritorious consideration. As to his legal right, we have passed upon that question, and have solemnly decided that he had none. But before I go further, I ought perhaps to answer the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia, who sits in front of me, [Mr. BOULDIN]. He as well as his colleague over the way, [Mr. WISE], and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS], all rely upon precedent. They say we have practiced paying gentlemen who have appeared here and contested seats upon this floor. I know not how far gentlemen would carry this idea of precedent. Suppose a man came here who had never been a candidate, and claimed that he was entitled to a seat, would gentlemen urge that precedent would compel us to pay him for thus insulting our common sense?

Mr. BOULDIN requested the floor for the purpose of explanation, Mr. GIDDINGS yielded.

Mr. GIDDINGS resumed. I will suppose, sir, that the man who comes to contest the seat urges that he is an older man, that he is, if you please, a better Democrat than the one who holds the seat. Will the gentleman urge that we should pay him for thus intruding himself upon the business of the House? Yet he urges a reason.

Mr. THOMAS desired the floor for explanation, which was yielded to him by Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. T. said that in the cases from Mississippi, the House granted compensation to all the claimants, for the reason that they all had color of right.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I understand the gentleman from Maryland, and will touch upon this color of right; as applied to Mr. Jones. I was, sir, speaking of precedent, when I yielded the floor. A precedent, in order to be binding, must be in a parallel case. I have looked into the case, and I say, without hesitation, that I believe it out of the power of gentlemen to point me to a single case, in the history of this House, analogous to the one under consideration.

Mr. WISE said he would call the attention of the gentleman to the Mississippi case.

Mr. GIDDINGS said he intended to notice that case as soon as he could get to it. I say, sir, this case is distinguishable from all other cases that have occurred since the formation of the Government, in this respect. That General Jones, under his election in 1836, had served two full years, prior to the present session, and was now endeavoring to hold the office three years under one election. There is not a case of this description on record. They all occurred at the beginning of the service, when different persons claimed to have been elected, except the one from Mississippi; and then the question was whether the sitting members could hold for the full term of two years, or for the special session only. But here Mr. Jones had served his full term of two years, and attempts to hold over one year longer. No one contested his right for the whole time provided by the Constitution and law under which he was elected. That time having fully expired, he presents himself here, in my opinion, as destitute of right, or of color of right, as though he had never been here; nor do the precedents apply to his case with any more power, in my opinion, than they would if he had never been elected, or held a seat here.

Mr. BOULDIN and Mr. WISE both rose to explain; and Mr. GIDDINGS yielded the floor for some time.

When Mr. GIDDINGS resumed, he said, Mr. Speaker, I protest against these frequent interruptions. They derange my course of argument, and I shall surely charge it all to the gentlemen from Virginia.

I think no one will urge that there has been a parallel case in this House, and of course we are not bound to grant to Mr. Jones $1,900 from any precedent established by this House. But I object to it on the important principle, that by giving him a compensation we shall establish a precedent in this case—a precedent by which any of us, after one term of service shall expire, may return here, claim a seat, and if ousted, call on the Government for our travel fees and per diem. Such a precedent I protest against.

I will now return to the point respecting the merits of Mr. Jones's claims. In 1836, while Mr. Jones was a Delegate from Michigan, that Territory was admitted into the Union, and Wisconsin created a Territory. By the organic law, the Territory of Wisconsin was authorized to elect a Delegate to Congress. Orders for an election were issued. At that election Mr. Jones was a candidate. He solicited the suffrages of the people; was elected; received a certificate of his election; came here, and presented his credentials as a Delegate from Wisconsin; was sworn as such, and served as such for two full years. But the two gentlemen from Virginia and the gentleman from Maryland insist that he continued as the Delegate from Michigan through the whole of the Twenty-Fourth Congress. Yes, sir; after being elected, sworn, and serving as a Delegate for the full term of two years, and enjoying all the privileges of the office, receiving the pay as such, we are now told that he did it in his own wrong; that he mistook the law; that, although he was sworn, and served, and received pay as a Delegate from Wisconsin, yet he was, in fact and in law, a Delegate from Michigan.

Mr. WISE desired the floor to explain. Mr. G. yielded, and Mr. W. explained.

Mr. GIDDINGS proceeded. I say that Mr. Jones, then, by his words, his acts, his oath, declared to this House, to the nation, and to the world, that he was then, in December, 1836, a Delegate from Wisconsin. This House, in solemn argument and full deliberation, here said, by a majority of more than five to one, that he was right. Suppose he now says he was wrong, and that his time did not commence till December, 1837, ought we to pay him for thus stultifying himself; for contradicting his former acts, words, and oath of office? Having served the full term, and received full pay, if he now seeks to make a speculation by coming here, he ought not to do it at the expense of the people. But I ask the gentleman to point out the meritorious or equitable consideration for which we are to allow him nearly two thousand dollars of the public treasure. Will gentlemen say that he has promoted the business of the House? I answer, he has detained the House, and occupied the time of two hundred and forty members, with our clerks, officers, and attendants, more than one entire day! Does this entitle him to compensation? Will gentlemen say that he has saved the funds of the nation? I answer, his appearance here and claim have lost the nation from $5,000 to $8,000. And would the gentleman from Maryland, or either of the gentlemen from Virginia, pay him $2,000 more as a compensation for doing so? Is this meritorious? Do we bid up such honesty for wasting the national treasure? Will gentlemen say that he has here represented the people or the interests of Wisconsin? I answer, he has set himself in opposition to their views, kept out of this hall their rightful Delegate, and delayed their business for four weeks; and now claims at our hands a bonus of near $2,000 for doing it. And now, if there is any just, any equitable claim that he has upon the national funds, I hope gentlemen will point it out, for the obliquity of my vision prevents my seeing it. Had Mr. Jones come to this city and taken a seat in the gallery as a spectator, no one would have thought of paying him. In that case, had he asked for his mileage and per diem, all would have considered it an insult. I ask, does he come now with stronger claims than he would in the case supposed? He has retarded the business of the House, increased the national expenditure, kept the rightful Delegate of his Territory from his seat here, disappointed the expectations of his people, opposed their wishes and retarded their business. But do these circumstances add to the real merits of his claim? If there be equity, if there be justice in the claim, surely the able chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. THOMAS], with his legal acumen, is able to point it out, and demonstrate the principle on which it rests. I desire to hear which act, or which acts of Mr. Jones entitles him to the compensation? On what particular principles of equity or common justice does this claim rest? I dislike this keeping at a distance from the subject, this firing at long shots, this dealing in generals. It was the saying of a very eminent jurist that "fraud lurks in generalities." When our public treasure is to be dealt out, I desire to see some definite, some obvious reason assigned for it.

But, if I understood the Speaker at the commencement of this debate, he thought that the "House had recognized Mr. Jones as the sitting member." If this be fact, we ought not now to refuse compensation to him. We should be estopped now from denying that which we admitted at the commencement of the session. In other words, we are bound by the same principles by which Mr. Jones is bound—the principle alluded to some time since, in which I stated that Mr. Jones, having asserted himself to be the Delegate in 1836, should not, in 1838, say he was not a Delegate in 1836. I would apply the same rule to ourselves. It is not merely a rule of law, but it is a rule of consistency, of common justice, and common sense. If we have expressly recognized Mr. Jones as the Delegate, by such recognition we must have induced him to remain here and spend his time, and we ought not now to turn round and say he is not entitled to compensation for his time. If this House have, in fact, led Mr. Jones into error, the loss ought not to fall on him. If the nation induced him to come here and spend his time, nothing can be more plain than that dictate of justice which says the nation shall pay him. But how stands the case? Mr. Jones's time had fully expired. The office was vacant. Mr. Doty was here, had selected his seat, and at the proper time presented his credentials for the purpose of taking the oath as the Delegate from Wisconsin. To this Mr. Jones objected, denying the right of Mr. Doty. On this objection the administration of the oath was delayed. The objection was the act of Mr. Jones; by it he gained nothing. The delay in receiving Mr. Doty was the act of the House, in courtesy to Mr. Jones's objection. But it is difficult for me to see how we recognized Mr. Jones by delaying the reception of Mr. Doty. I think no one will say that thus far we had recognized Mr. Jones. By what act, then, did he become the sitting member? Was it by sitting in the hall instead of the gallery? He had been a member here, and by the rules of the House had the privilege of the Hall. Then he gained nothing by his seat. But I apprehend that no gentleman will claim any recognition by this House except by the vote of the House. A legislative body can only speak, can only act by their vote. The rule is too plain to be misunderstood. It requires a majority of the House to do any act. That majority is ascertained by vote. Hence arises the rule that "a legislative body can only act or speak by vote." Having laid down the rules by which we could have recognized Mr. Jones as the Delegate, we will proceed to inquire whether we have, by vote of the House, thus recognized him as the Delegate. The first vote of the House was to refer Mr. Doty's right to a seat here to the Committee of Elections. This, I think, will not be urged as a recognition of Mr. Jones. The next vote of the House declared that Mr. Doty had the right to a seat as Delegate, and that Mr. Jones had no such right. This, then, is the only recognition of Mr. Jones by the House. It is an express denial. The only vote on the subject given by the House, in words as plain as language permits, denies his right here; and yet it is urged that we have recognized him as the sitting Delegate. I ask gentlemen to point us to the vote, to the act of this House, by which we recognized him as a Delegate. Let them no longer keep at a distance, but let them refer the House to the specific, the particular recognition. Let them give time, place, and circumstances. And now, Mr. Speaker, I will only add that having assigned the views which will govern me in my vote, I rest the subject with the House. In doing this, I have spoken freely and unreservedly. Of Mr. Jones, as a man and a gentleman, I know nothing except what appears from the case before us. From that I speak, and on that I must act. I know that it is a delicate subject to combat the granting of money to one who has mingled with members in this Hall—one who has long associated with them as a fellow-member. But, sir, I was not sent here to indulge in delicacy of feeling, where the public treasure is concerned. My generosity may be displayed in my private concerns, but not with the public funds. I have no right to give away that which belongs to the nation. It is a fact, so far as my experience has extended, that claims urged upon this House meet with little favor, unless based upon principles of obvious justice and policy. Such I know to be the case so far as they come through the committee over which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAMBERS] presides with so much zeal and devotion to the national interests. Sir, the widow and the orphan, rendered destitute and penniless by Indian barbarities, are denied, sternly denied, indemnity for their loss of houses, furniture, and property, sustained by conflagrations kindled with savage hands; and shall we bestow the money withheld from them on claims like the one under consideration? Shall we, sir, guard and defend the public treasure with one hand, while with the other we scatter it to the four winds of heaven?

Mr. CALHOUN considered that Mr. Jones had been elected for the whole Congress, and not for a fraction only. He considered him entitled to the money, as he had come on with a strong case. Mr. Jones had now been here six weeks, awaiting the decision of the House; and if he was not entitled to any remuneration for such time, why had not the House taken the matter up and decided it at once?

Mr. POPE advocated the claim, on the ground that there were good and substantial reasons for disputing the seat. Had Mr. Doty been the unsuccessful competitor, he would have voted for the payment of his expenses on the same ground. He hoped the resolution would not be adopted.

Mr. BIDDLE said that he had been deprived, by accident, of the opportunity of voting on the original question; and he felt, therefore, the more earnest in resisting the present motion. The practice of the House was admitted to be, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to make the allowance when satisfied that the contest had not been idly raised, but that the question presented was one fit to invoke its grave and deliberate judgment.

The practice was a salutary one. The House had never stultified itself by holding that it was incompetent to discriminate, and to guard against abuses. It was calculated to place all candidates and all classes of voters on a footing. If a candidate, in case of contest, could not come on to urge his claim (and we all know that, in practice, his presence is indispensable) without danger of pecuniary sacrifice in the event of a failure, only the man of ample means will venture on the experiment. In the poorer agricultural districts, voters will not be inclined, or able, to raise a purse by individual contribution to send on their champion, and the result would be an incalculable advantage to the man of affluence, or to him who had wealthy backers.

The position in which Mr. Jones stood claimed for his case the most candid consideration. He had received the money from the Speaker; it was beyond recall; but on an intimation from a single member that a question would be raised, he instantly places it at our disposal, with an expression of his cheerful acquiescence in whatever decision we may make. Mr. B. would not say of our departing associate, "nothing in life became him like the leaving of it," but he would say that his course conformed to the frank, ingenuous, and honorable spirit by which that gentleman had ever been characterized. Mr. B. said it was not his intention to go at large into the argument as to Mr. Jones's right to the seat. Yet an outline would not be misplaced.

The earliest act which had a distinct bearing on the question was that of March 3, 1817, entitled "An act further to regulate the Territories of the United States, and their electing Delegates to Congress."

This act is not of a temporary, occasional character; it is a well-matured and far-sighted supplement to the great ordinance of 1787; calculated to meet a new aspect in the affairs of the Territories. It provides as follows:

"In every Territory of the United States in "which a temporary government has been, or hereafter shall be established, and which, by virtue of the ordinance of 1787, or of any subsequent act of Congress passed or to be passed, now hath, or hereafter shall have the right to send a Delegate to Congress, such Delegate shall be elected every second year, for the same term of two years for which members of the House of Representatives of the United States are entitled."

No one can well doubt the object or the wisdom of this provision. It draws the political action of the Territory, as promptly as possible, into exact coincidence with that of the States; so that the people shall become familiarized to the usages which are finally to prevail; that its habits shall become fixed in harmony with those of the Union.

It must be apparent to every one how widely the decision which has been made by the House, in reference to Wisconsin, violates this policy. The Delegate is to serve a moiety of his term in the present Congress, and a moiety in the next.

Instead of duly attaching the Territory to the train of cars which has preceded her, she is placed with one wheel in the middle of the track and the other outside of it, and; in the end, we shall be obliged to lift her, by main bodily force, from this false and awkward position, in order to place her upon the track into which she ought to have been wheeled at the outset. See another strange result! The validity of each election has to be passed upon by two distinct and independent bodies. We decide as to that portion which falls within our political existence; and the remainder is in abeyance until our successors shall assemble a year hence!

The necessity for this course, on our part, is thus made out by those who insist on it. An act of Congress of the third of February, 1819, in relation to the Territory of Michigan, provides that "the citizens of Michigan Territory be, and they are hereby, authorized to elect one Delegate to the Congress of the United States;" and the person thus elected "shall be furnished, by the Governor of said Territory, with a certificate, under his official seal, setting forth that he is duly elected, by the qualified electors, the Delegate from said Territory to the Congress of the United States, for the term of two years from the date of said certificate."

Doubtless this is explicit, and overrules the act of 1817. Not only does it violate the policy of that act, but it contains, moreover, a most anomalous and alarming provision. The Governor of a Territory is the creature of the President of the United States. Yet his will shall determine the term of office of a Representative in the popular branch of Congress! No time is provided within which he shall give the certificate. He may postpone it if he desire that a political favorite shall reach an anticipated crisis in the affairs of the country, or he may antedate it, or give to it the earliest possible date, in order that a political adversary may be cut short of reaching the same crisis.

The question is whether these extraordinary provisions have passed into the act of 1836, "establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin." That act bears date 20th April, 1836, and provides that "a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve for the term of two years, may be elected." It provides further, that "the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the Governor to be duly elected, and a certificate thereof shall be given to the person so elected."

Thus it will be seen that whilst the provisions, of the two acts are, to a certain degree, coincident, the act of 1836 omits the very words which, in relation to the act of 1819, compels us reluctantly to give a construction at variance with obvious policy, and rendering the term of office of a member of this House contingent on the accidental date of the Governor's certificate. How, then, are we to render definite what is thus left open in the act of 1836? Shall we, with a sort of mother's fondness for the most deformed and perverse of our offspring, reinstate the obnoxious words thus discarded, with all their attendant mischief and inconvenience? Shall we do this, or shall we rather presume that Congress, in the striking difference of phraseology, and in apparently abandoning the commencement of the term of service, so expressly insisted on by the act of 1819, meant to leave its commencement and duration to the quiet operation of the standing law of 1817? Can any one doubt that the established rules of construction, as well as common sense, call for the latter interpretation?

It is true, the act of 1836 declares that "the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act; subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Wisconsin."

But, aside from many other considerations, is it not plain, from the very terms of this clause, that it applies to the details of jurisprudence, and not to points of organic political structure, which are, of course, beyond the reach of territorial legislation? The act of 1836 says, too, "the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof, may be applicable." If any bearing can be ascribed to this provision on the present question, it is in bringing into direct application the fundamental act of 1817 and not the act of 1819, which, on its face, is special to Michigan, and was exhausted in that function.

It is asserted, however, that Mr. Jones has himself put a construction on the act of 1836, by taking his seat a session in advance of that which would be the first under the interpretation now contended for. In point of fact he denies this, alleging that he relied on his antecedent election as a Delegate from the Territory of Michigan, and that, in any event, he is curtailed of the full benefit of the popular favor extended to him. But I will not confuse the subject by any such inquiry; we have nothing to do with it. This is not a case in which to talk of estoppel, or of the argumentum ad hominem. The only question before us is as to the efficacy of the popular action of Wisconsin in 1836. We are to look to the rights of the people of that Territory, and not of the individual who chances to be the instrument through whom they are enjoyed. This would be so even in private transactions where the rights of the people are not concerned. Suppose a power of attorney given to act for two years, but the power not to be exercised until a year from the date of the instrument; the agent enters at once upon his attorneyship, and people deal with him accordingly, not looking beyond the seal and the accustomed forms of authentication. Will it be pretended that this premature action is to abridge the term fixed in the power? Would a judge say that the term must be narrowed to one year, because the agent commenced a twelvemonth too soon? Surely such a notion would be scouted; and yet the cry might well be raised that here was a man acting, in fact, for three years, under a power limited to two. No, sir; it is our business, in the exercise of a high judicial function, to ascertain which are the "two years" meant by the act of 1836. We are not to hunt up and adopt the misconstruction or blunders of others, but to be right ourselves. Fix truly the construction of the power asserted by the people of Wisconsin in 1836, and then give it effect as a high duty to that people.

Mr. B. said he would not pursue the subject further; and very far was he from asserting, in the face of the recent vote, that the positions he had hastily taken were impregnable. But he did feel that the question was a grave and arduous one, that had properly been raised for decision. It was a case touching the rights of Wisconsin, and the regular course of her political action, in which judgment ought not to have been suffered to go by default from the omission of the only individual who could present the case for adjudication. On the whole, he believed that no occasion had occurred in which the practice of the House in making this allowance could with greater propriety be followed.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution, Mr. GRIFFIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS inquired of the Speaker whether in case the resolution should be rejected, he would consider it as authority to pay Mr. Jones his per diem and mileage.

The SPEAKER said he should so consider it. The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution; and decided in the negative—yeas 89, nays 96; as follows:

SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATION.

REMARKS OF HON. W. TAYLOR.

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 9, 1839,

On the Resolution to appoint a Committee to investigate the Swartwout Defalcation.

The question being on the motion to appoint a committee by ballot,

Mr. TAYLOR rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BOND], in his comments upon the enormous fraud upon the Treasury, in the case of the late collector of the port of New York, for the reason that we are about to appoint a committee to investigate that case, and I prefer waiting for the action of the committee, and such additional information as the investigation may furnish; and on this point I will at present only say that I must wait for further developments, and have other and better reasons, before I can see any justification whatever in the course gentlemen have pursued in their invectives against the Secretary of the Treasury, and censure of the Administration. I am not aware of any objections to the appointment of the committee, and hope and trust that, when appointed, they will perform their duty with a most rigid scrutiny, that all the facts and circumstances in the case may be exposed, so that we may fully understand how this fraud has been committed, whether others are implicated, and to what extent; and whether there has been any want of faithfulness in any public officer intrusted with the management of any part of the financial operations of the Government; and then, sir, let the blame rest where it justly belongs.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] charges upon the friends of the Administration a change of conduct, from that which they exhibited two years since when it was proposed to appoint a committee to investigate abuses, and says they are now forced to come out in favor of a committee of investigation. The gentleman is mistaken if he imagines there is any change in this respect. What was the proposition at the time alluded to? After gentlemen, as usual, had freely indulged in broad and general charges of corruption on the part of the Administration, a resolution was offered to appoint a select committee, without any definite or specific object, but for the general purpose of endeavoring to hunt up something, somewhere and somehow, to justify the charge. The committee was not to be confined even to public officers, but to extend their inquiries to any one "directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially." It was to be a sort of general "corruption" hunting committee. To the appointment of a committee for such general and indefinite objects, and with such unlimited powers, there were objections, and those objections were urged upon this floor.

And, sir, we saw enough on that occasion connected with sending committees in search of undefined abuses, whether official or unofficial, resulting in no public good, to strengthen all objections to such a measure. But, even then, the resolution was sustained by the vote of almost every friend of the Administration; and I would ask when, on what occasion have they manifested any unwillingness to investigate any and every alleged case of fraud or defalcation, any specific charge against any public officer? Never, since I have been honored with a seat in this House.

I am opposed, sir, to the amendment which proposes to appoint the committee by ballot, and if there was no other reasons than those which have been assigned in favor of the proposition, these would be, to my mind, conclusive against it. The rule requires the Speaker to appoint all committees, "unless otherwise specially directed by the House." This rule has seldom been departed from, and in no instance, to my recollection, within the last six years. Why, then, is it proposed to change the mode on this occasion? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] tells us that the Speaker will be subject to the charge of unfairness, of partiality, of having selected a packed committee, and he desires to relieve him from the responsibility. And because the Opposition may cast upon the Speaker unjust and unworthy imputations, is that any reason why we should take from him any of his ordinary official duties, and relieve him from responsibility?

When, sir, has the time been, since the present incumbent has occupied that chair, that these charges have not been made? And I have yet to learn that the duties have not been well performed, or that the Speaker shrinks from the responsibilities of his station, and desires us to relieve him. But another gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] comes more boldly to the point, and assigns another and a very different reason. He tells us plainly that he wishes to avoid the Speaker; he is unwilling to trust him. He doubtless has his object in view, and while gentlemen talk about a whitewashing committee, we may with not less

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Defalcation of Samuel Swartwout—Mr. Taylor.

HO. OF REPS.

propriety suppose they desire to elect a blacking committee, to subvert party purposes. They will not, of course, expect my vote for any such object, and neither shall I sanction the unjust imputations cast upon the Speaker, by voting with them to take from him, on this occasion, the appointing power. I have no want of confidence in the Speaker, believing that a committee selected in the usual mode will be composed of men who will faithfully and impartially investigate the subject referred to them, having in view the protection of the public interest and the promotion of the public good.

But, sir, investigation of particular frauds upon the Treasury will avail but little, unless we turn our attention to the remedy for these evils.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] tells us there is no remedy but in a change of the Administration; turn out the present incumbents of office, and put in a new set. Why, sir, this has been the object and unremitting effort of the party to which that gentleman belongs, for these many years. It is to get into power by any available means; and they would fain make the people believe that if the pure, immaculate Whig party should succeed, then all would be right. But I can tell gentlemen you may turn out, and put in, until doomsday, and unless you change the system of collecting and keeping the public money, and remedy the defects of law, defalcations will happen, so long as man is depraved, and subject to temptation. And, in the language of the message of the President, the recent defalcations "furnish 'the strongest motive for the establishment of a 'more severe and secure system for the safekeeping 'and disbursement of the public moneys than any 'that has heretofore existed.'" Sir, it seems to be a prominent part of the policy of the Whig party to charge upon the administration of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, all the defalcations that have happened since the organization of the Government. And I was somewhat surprised to hear the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Mason] speak of the alarming defalcations of the last nine years, confining himself to that period, as though little or nothing of the kind had occurred before. Sir, I have turned my attention to the celebrated document (No. 111) which has been so freely, and I may say unfairly, used to convey this impression, and it is from this that I will show how unfounded and unjust is the charge. This document contains a statement of amounts due from collectors of customs and receivers of public moneys, who were out of office on the 12th October, 1837. None of these, therefore, are chargeable to the present Administration. The aggregate amount due from collectors of the customs, since the organization of the Government to the 12th October, 1837, as appears by this document, is about $1,445,000. Of this amount, I find about $211,324 standing against dates within the period of General Jackson's administration, excluding those cases ascertained to be defaulters within the month of his first inauguration, and therefore not justly chargeable to his Administration. Of this amount, the indebtedness of Mr. Ingersoll, the district attorney of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and that of Mr. McCulloch, collector of Baltimore, known to be balanced, make in the aggregate $91,244; and should therefore be deducted, leaving $120,080. Indeed, it appears, from this same document, that a suit was ordered against Mr. Ingersoll for the amount stated in the table, but that judgment was obtained for only $3,985 78, which has been paid; and Mr. McCulloch never was a defaulter to any amount. There are several others of this class whose indebtedness has been reduced in whole or in part, or have offsets to the claims against them and others, against whom the security is considered ample. We have not, at present, the means of knowing precisely the amount paid and secured, but it would not be too high an estimate to rate it at fifty or sixty thousand dollars, leaving the estimate of loss by collectors, during the eight years of General Jackson's administration, at sixty or seventy thousand dollars. It is to be presumed that the balances which have stood on the books of the Department, uncanceled for the past ten years, (from the time General Jackson came into office,) constituting an aggregate of about $1,233,000, are not, to any considerable amount, secured, and therefore a large proportion may be considered as lost. In making an estimate of the relative amount of defalcation and loss sustained under different administrations, it is proper to take into account the amount of money collected; and we find the aggregate of receipts from customs, during the first four years of General Jackson's administration, was about eleven millions more than during the term of his immediate predecessor. It then, sir, appears by this celebrated document, when carefully examined, that the amount of loss from collectors of customs, during the eight years when General Jackson administered the Government, will not much exceed one third of the average amount for the same number of years in all the preceding Administrations since the organization of the Government! And it may not be unworthy of remark that, as I understand, not more than two or three of these collectors who are defaulters were originally appointed by him, and the balances against them are small.

As to the balances which appear in this document against public receivers, the same remark will apply as to such as have remained uncanceled for nine or ten years. Most of these may be considered lost, while of those that have occurred since that time, a large proportion have been paid or secured; so that it is believed not more than two hundred thousand dollars may be considered doubtful, being much less in amount than the loss sustained under previous administrations. The whole amount of receipts from the sale of lands since they were first brought into market, is $94,737,943; of this sum about sixty millions were sold under General Jackson's administration, and in one year a larger amount than the aggregate of any twelve years preceding. Here, then, the comparison again results most decidedly in favor of General Jackson's administration; and if defalcations are to be considered as authorizing the charge of "corruption," gentlemen would do well to consider on whose head the charge might fall with greatest weight. Certainly not upon the head of the venerable Jackson.

So much, sir, for this celebrated document, which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] moved to have reprinted in an extra number, to be again sent out to the public; a document which, all now admit, does great injustice to many worthy and honorable men, who never have been in reality defaulters to the Government, but whose accounts, not having yet been balanced at the Department, they were reported as they stood upon the books, in conformity to a call of this House. And, sir, this list of defaulters, without any dates showing when the defalcations occurred—calculated, nay, designed, to give a false impression—was, during the late political contest in the State of New York paraded in every Whig newspaper throughout the State, and posted up in every bar-room in the country, under the head "sub-treasurers." Mr. Speaker, if these are sub-treasurers, I would ask, to what system is the term applicable by way of reproach? Why, sir, they belong exclusively to your bank-deposit system; for these defalcations are all connected with that system, have all occurred under it, and I had almost said grown out of it; they have all happened while the public deposits were made either in the Bank of the United States or the State banks, and under those laws and regulations for collecting and keeping the public money which have long existed. And it is a question of the highest moment, and worthy the deepest consideration, whether the bank-deposit system, and present defects of law, have not essentially contributed to a deterioration of public morals, in the strong inducements which are offered to speculation, and the temptations which are presented to the eye of avarice, without any adequate counteracting influence; and it is a question of no less importance to determine, whether the indulgence heretofore given to any of the depositories of the public money, to use it for banking or any other purpose, is not a violation of that article of the Constitution which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in consequence of appropriations by law."

The suspension of specie payments by the banks, their refusal or inability to pay over the vast amount of public deposits which they held, and the consequent financial embarrassments of the Government, producing a necessity for convening Congress to provide the means of carrying on the ordinary operations of the Government, induced the President carefully to examine this subject, and to recommend a radical change in the system of keeping the public moneys. And one of the most important features in the system proposed, was the prevention of the use of the public money for any purpose whatever, except those objects for which it had been collected from the people, and appropriated by law. This great constitutional measure forms one of the prominent, and I may say, most important points at issue, between the friends of the Administration and its opponents. So long have the banks been profited by the use of the public money, that they have come almost to claim it as a right; and to propose to deprive them of this source of profit and speculation, and to leave them, as you leave other interests, to stand upon their own foundation, you are told at once that you are "making war upon the banks," and the Opposition are found rallying to a man against the measure! At the last session of Congress, when a bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to modify the last clause of the fifth section of the deposit act of June 23, 1836, and for other purposes," was under consideration, a member from South Carolina [Mr. CAMPBELL] moved an amendment in these words: "And provided, also, 'That nothing in this act shall be so construed as 'to authorize the use of the Government deposits for 'banking purposes.'" Upon this question every Whig member present voted against the proposition, and every Democratic member in its favor; and I remember well, sir, that you had the honor of giving the casting vote in favor of the amendment.

Here, sir, was presented the naked question, whether the banks should use the money collected from the people as capital for banking, to be loaned out to merchants, speculators, and favorites, or whether it should be regarded as a fund belonging to the people, and to be used only for those purposes for which it had been collected and appropriated by law. The position of parties on this question made it quite evident on which side that power, which consults chiefly its own pecuniary advantages, would throw, in the main, the weight of its influence. It was not expected that the class of men who are most benefited by the use of the public money, would yield to a principle which was to deprive them of so great an advantage, without a desperate effort. And, accordingly, we have witnessed one of the most violent and bitter political contests which this country has ever experienced; a contest in which the power of money, the influence of associated wealth, and the combined efforts of that class of men whose selfish and exclusive interests were to be subserved in this matter by the success of the Whig party, operating with acknowledged ingenuity and skill upon all the elements of opposition, were too apparent to escape the notice of the most careless and indifferent observer. Doubtless, sir, it may have been good party policy to keep out of view as much as possible this important question, and to thrust forward other topics more available for electioneering purposes; such as "the dangers of the purse and the sword in the hands of one man," "the alarming increase of executive patronage and power;" terms that may do very well as catchwords to be played upon at an election, but which, in reality, have no meaning whatever when applied to the system proposed for collecting and keeping the public money. Let this question be well understood, divested of the rubbish thrown around it to keep out of view the true point at issue; let the people see what motive could have moved to such an unwonted zeal a certain class in the present political contest—what could have induced that extraordinary and profuse liberality which has poured its thousand and tens of thousands into the party treasury, constituting what has been most aptly termed "a corruption fund," to carry an election; and let gentlemen meet this question fairly upon its true merits, upon the broad question whether the use of the public money, by corporations or individuals, for any purpose whatever except as it shall be appropriated by law, can be longer permitted without endangering the public interest, inducing a laxity of public morals, and violating at least the spirit of a constitutional prohibition; let this leading point at issue between the parties be fairly met, and the result is not, and cannot, be doubtful.

25TH CONG., 3D SESS.

Defalcation of Samuel Swartwout—Mr. Bond, Mr. Taylor.

Ho. OF REPS.

Do gentlemen expect to subserve party purposes by this onset, this effort to charge upon the present Administration all defalcations that have ever happened under our Government, and by a display of declamatory invective and wholesale charges of "corruption," to divert public attention from the true issue? There may be in all this some political skill, some party tact, but I can tell gentlemen that the plan will not succeed, either in battering down the Administration, or in diverting public attention from those reform measures recommended in the message, and necessary to prevent those evils which belong to the system to which the gentlemen adhere. They cannot, by playing the old game of proposing nothing and endeavoring to defeat everything, avoid responsibility to the people, or prevent them from perceiving the obvious and palpable necessity of "an early enactment, similar to that of other countries, by which the application of public money by an officer of the Government to private uses, should be made a felony and visited with severe and ignominious punishment," as recommended by the President. This measure they will not, they dare not, directly oppose. And, sir, this point gained, this principle established, and gentlemen will find it extremely difficult to convince the people, the farmers, the laboring class, those who have no selfish purpose to subserve in this matter, but look only to the general good, that the same rule in this respect should not apply to banks that you apply to individuals; that these should be the special favorites of Government, privileged more than others, and especially after the lamentable consequences so recently experienced by employing them as depositories, and giving them for banking purposes, the use and control of the public money. It will be difficult to persuade the honest, intelligent yeomanry of the country why corporations should be privileged to do that, for their own profit and advantage, which you declare to be a felony if done by an individual, subjecting him to a severe and ignominious punishment.

To prevent banks as well as individuals from using the public money for their own benefit, is, then, but the second step which naturally and necessarily follows in this financial reform, a reform which distinguishes the policy of the present Administration. And this principle, carried out and made applicable alike to all who may be intrusted with the keeping of the public money, as it must and will be, and you have but one step further in the process of restoring the financial system of the Government to its original constitutional track; you have but to confine the custody of the public money to such officers of the Government as shall be constitutionally appointed and responsible to the people. And, to settle this latter point, I apprehend there would be less difficulty, because patriotism would occupy the place of self-interest, which would be excluded, and it would be chiefly a question of safety and constitutional principle.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what may have been said in favor of the superior advantages, in point of safety, of employing banks as depositories of the public money, I believe it is susceptible of the clearest proof that the public loss has been far greater from this source than from individual defalcations. At the last session of Congress we had a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, giving a comparative estimate, by which it appears that the loss sustained by bank failures exceeded $1,000,000, while that from individuals fell short of that amount, and this without any of those safeguards and securities which it is now proposed to supply; and let it be remembered that this estimate was independent of the loss of $5,580,000, by taking depreciated bank paper in the years 1814, 1815, 1816, and 1817. What amount, if any, will be finally lost of the deposits in the banks at the time of the suspension of specie payments remains to be seen. But independent of that, when you take into account the expense incurred by the necessity of an extra session of Congress, and the interest to be paid on Treasury notes, the issue of which was rendered necessary by the failure of the banks to fulfill their obligations to the Government, and the amount will swell to a vast sum chargeable to the loss account, by the use of banks as depositories of the public moneys. Why, sir, I would inquire, are gentlemen so silent upon bank defaulters, which have inflicted so great evils upon the country, while they are so loud and eloquent in their denunciation of individual defalcations? How long is it, sir, since the deposit banks, "pet banks," the "corrupt and corrupting system," was the theme of eloquent and bitter invective and denunciation? But now, since the system has exploded, and inflicted the most severe injuries upon the Government and the people, when there is something tangible of which we may justly complain, all with them is silent; not a word of complaint is uttered. Why is this, sir? Is it because the "pet banks" have taken refuge in the ranks of their pursuers? Is it because they are found, in the main, efficient auxiliaries in the war upon the Administration? Is it because the system is found a pretty good half-way house, in which they hope to recruit their strength for their final destination—the marble palace?

But, Mr. Speaker, the question of loss sustained by the bank deposit system dwindles into comparative insignificance when compared with its evils in other respects. The influence it has in deranging the currency, by contributing to excessive bank issues and sudden contractions, the stimulus it gives to speculation and extravagance, with all their demoralizing influences, its effects upon legislation, encouraging high duties and extravagant appropriations, and the natural consequence of bringing the money power into our political contests, and to bear upon the purity of our elections, with all its corrupting tendencies. These, sir, are evils of a character that admit of no estimate by mere dollars and cents, and should awaken the attention of every friend to the permanent prosperity of the country, and the purity of its institutions.

The defalcations and frauds upon the Treasury, now so justly complained of, have doubtless, some of them at least, had their origin in the speculating mania, encouraged to its wildest extent by the bank-deposit system. Look at the Swartwout case, and at what period do you find his indebtedness to the Government swelling with the greatest rapidity to the largest amount? Why, sir, it was in those years when your surplus money in the banks was increasing to some thirty or forty millions of dollars, ministering to and urging on the speculating mania, which swept over the land with the contagion of a desolating pestilence. Perhaps nothing can more forcibly exhibit the extent to which this excitement was carried than the astonishing fact that, during the years 1835 and 1836, there were sold of your public lands more than two fifths of the entire amount of sales since the organization of the Government. From a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it appears that the whole amount paid into the Treasury from sales of the public lands, since the land sales first commenced to the 30th September, 1837, was $94,496,543; and of this amount there was paid in the years 1835 and 1836, $39,399,580; whereas, previous to that time, the amount seldom exceeded $2,000,000 a year, and generally fell much short of that sum. That the use made of the public money by the banks was mainly instrumental in producing these results, was charged upon this floor by those gentlemen who are now in favor of continuing to the banks this privilege. It was justly complained that the money was loaned out to speculators to buy up the public domain, and thus returned into the Treasury again, to perform the same office; and to prevent this, the Secretary of the Treasury issued the much-abused specie circular.

Mr. BOND here called the attention of Mr. T. to a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. Taney] advising the deposit banks to discount upon the public money.

Mr. TAYLOR continued. Sir, I well remember that letter, and the circumstances under which it was written, for it is a period in the history of this country not soon to be forgotten. It was after the deposits were removed from the Bank of the United States, and when the effort was making to produce a panic and pressure in the money market, when the bank commenced the curtailment of its discounts, and predictions of distress and ruin, from the scarcity of money, was heard from the Opposition in every quarter, that the Secretary, to prevent, as far as possible, the fulfillment of these predictions, and the designs of the bank party, encouraged the banks to more liberal discounts upon the public deposits; and surely, if anything could justify such a course, it was the circumstances under which the advice was issued. But, sir, I was about to show how the Swartwout defalcation appeared connected with the speculating excitement, and progressed with it. From a report laid upon our table, it appears that this defalcation commenced from a small beginning in 1830, and gradually increased until, in 1834, it had reached the amount of $50,370; in 1835, when your surplus deposits in the banks were essentially aiding and contributing to the excessive expansion of bank circulation, and kindling up the wild spirit of speculation, it increased to $86,000; in 1836, about $200,000, and in 1837 more than $680,000! thus keeping pace with the speculations and extravagance of the times. Perhaps this case, like many others, in its incipient stage, might plead the excuse of honest intention, the design of replacing what had been withdrawn; but as it advanced, and the golden harvest from imagined profitable investment dazzled before the eye of the collector, recourse was had to artfully-contrived deception and fraudulent concealment, and he was swept along in the broad current of extravagance and speculation which was bearing rapidly along its thousands to misery and ruin. He may, perhaps, have consoled himself under the turpitude of his official perjury by the reflection that he was violating no law that regarded his offense as a crime, subjecting him to an ignominious punishment; that, at most, it was legally but an indebtedness to the Government; and that, in using some portion of the public money for the benefit of himself and friends, he was but doing that which was permitted the banks to do, if paid over to them.

But, Mr. Speaker, however defective the system may be under which this defalcation has happened, nothing can excuse or palliate the moral turpitude of so gross a fraud upon the Treasury, and so base and ungrateful abuse of public trust and confidence. And while I will raise my voice as loud as the loudest in condemning this and all similar cases, and give my aid to raise a committee for a thorough investigation, I should deem myself unfaithful to the trust reposed in me, if I did not turn my attention to some remedy for those defects of law, which have enabled public agents to perpetrate these frauds with impunity, and lend my feeble efforts to change a system which has inflicted upon the country evils of a far more aggravated character, and resulted, not only in direct heavy losses by bank defaulters, but in one grand explosion, involving both Government and people in the most serious embarrassment and difficulty; and to my mind the remedy is plain and simple. Apply the knife to the root of the disease, to that cancer which is poisoning the body-politic; cut entirely the connection between the banks and the financial operations of the Government, so as to remove all necessity for any dependence upon them on the part of the Government, and all inducement to political influence on their part; take away the temptation for honest men to become rogues, and put it out of the power of rogues to cheat the public, and escape unwhipped of justice; make it a penal offense, criminal legally as it is morally, for any one to convert the public money to his own use for any purpose whatever, and establish such guards and checks as shall make it secure, and frauds of easy detection, and you will have discharged an important duty and rendered the country an essential service. These are measures that are identified with the policy of the present Administration, and which recommend themselves to our immediate action from the highest consideration of public duty. But if gentlemen of the Opposition, who appear to have in this House a majority, at least upon some of the most important questions connected with the finances, shall refuse their aid in the establishment of a more safe and secure system for the collection and keeping the public money, and in remedying the palpable defects of law, and prefer to leave things as they are, and to endeavor, by the indulgence of unjust and unfounded charges upon the Administration, to convert every public calamity into political capital for party purposes, an intelligent community will know on whom the responsibility should rest, and will hold them to a just and rigid accountability.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

SPEECH OF HON. SAM. CUSHMAN,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 2, 1839.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the motion to refer the various topics embraced in the annual message of the President—

Mr. CUSHMAN addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is with extreme regret that I take the floor to address the House upon the subject now under consideration. When I call to mind the shortness of the session, together with the great amount of public business now on the Calendar of this House, which ought to receive the immediate action of Congress, nothing, sir, but the harsh and unjust attack which has been made upon the Administration, and particularly upon the character of the Secretary of the Treasury, could induce me to trespass upon the time of the House for a single moment. Mr. Woodbury is my neighbor, my townsman, my personal and political friend, and one of the favorite sons of the State of New Hampshire. Being thus connected with that gentleman, and knowing, as I do, the purity of his character, and how highly he is esteemed by the people of his native State, whom I have the honor, in part, to represent, I should be faithless to my duty did I not repel the charges which have so wantonly been made against that distinguished public officer.

The very extraordinary attempt which has recently been made to injure the character of Mr. Woodbury, will, I presume, prove wholly abortive. I cannot believe that the reputation of any man, whose whole course of life has been one of uninterrupted brilliancy, is to be destroyed by a single breath of air. For a long series of years his works have stood forth in bold relief, to testify to the world that Mr. Woodbury is a man of untiring industry, of distinguished talents, and of incorruptible integrity; that fidelity hath marked his footsteps in every situation of life. The high intellectual and moral qualities of this gentleman have spoken in tones of eloquence, far more impressive than anything which I, or any other man, can utter. During the time he was engaged in his profession, as a lawyer in the New Hampshire courts, he very soon acquired a reputation which gave him a rank among the first of the many eminent men then at the bar in that State. For industry, ability, and fidelity, he was second to no one. And in consequence of the high reputation which he had so readily acquired in that learned profession, he was honored with the appointment of an associate justice of the highest court of judicature in that State, and this, too, before he had reached the age of thirty years.

For several years he continued to discharge the duties of that highly important and responsible trust with great ability and fidelity, by which he acquired for himself a reputation which will remain among those things which never perish—a reputation which his assailants may envy, but can never equal. Since Mr. Woodbury left the bench of the superior court, he has been principally engaged in political life. His term of service as Chief Magistrate of his native State was short; but soon after leaving that elevated situation, he was elected by the Legislature of that State to a seat in the north wing of this Capitol, where for six years, he sustained a very prominent rank among the most distinguished and patriotic statesmen of the country. Soon after his term of service expired in the Senate of the United States, he was appointed Secretary of the Navy, in which position, for several years, he not only sustained the high reputation he had previously acquired, but increased it with the increase of his sphere of usefulness.

It was in consequence of these developments of character for extraordinary industry, ability, and sterling integrity, that General Jackson was induced to place Mr. Woodbury at the head of the Treasury Department. And here, sir, that gentleman has overcome obstacle after obstacle, which has been thrown in his way by the Opposition, and has managed the financial affairs of the Government, as I think, with great skill, prudence, and fidelity; yet those who are opposed to Mr. Woodbury in political opinion may think otherwise; and judging from the declamation which we have recently heard upon this floor, for a few days past, we must know that there is an attempt, at least, to create an impression upon the public mind that Mr. Woodbury has not managed the affairs of the Treasury Department with fidelity, but, on the contrary, that he has not only been grossly negligent in the discharge of his official duties, but that he has connived at the frauds which have been committed by other officers of the Government. From such charges his previous life, however pure and spotless, cannot shield him; provided they are founded in truth. For this I do not contend; but I do contend that the good name which he had previously acquired ought to shield him from all such aspersions, until they are proved by the most clear and unequivocal testimony.

Now, sir, permit me to ask, whether any such evidence has been produced? In reply to this inquiry, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] as well as the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] and others, would refer me to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to this House in March last, "relative to defaulting collectors," &c., and say, there is the evidence which induced them to prefer these charges against that distinguished officer of the Government. These gentlemen have declared, in the hearing of this House, and of the country, that that document contains evidence to prove that Mr. Woodbury has, in divers instances, neglected not only to enforce the payment of moneys due the Government from receivers and disbursers of the public revenue, but that he has actually connived at their frauds and peculations upon the revenue of the Government. And to prove these facts, those gentlemen have called the attention of the House to the case of John Spencer, a receiver of public moneys at Fort Wayne, in Indiana; William Linn, of Illinois; W. P. Harris and G. S. Boyd, both of Mississippi; and Mr. Reckless, a late collector of the revenue at Perth Amboy, New Jersey; Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs at New York; and to General Gratiot, the chief engineer. All these cases, except the last two, are mentioned in the above-mentioned document, and to those cases I will now ask the attention of the House.

The first case which is offered in evidence, on which the Secretary of the Treasury is to be impeached, is that of Mr. Spencer. This gentleman is still in office, and the only one among those that have been named by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] as defaulters, who is in the service of the Government. But this gentleman has been very much misrepresented. Mr. Spencer has not been a public defaulter. He has always, fairly and honestly, paid into the Treasury of the United States all moneys which have come into his hands, and the Government never has, by any default on the part of Mr. Spencer, lost one dollar. Mr. Woodbury cannot, therefore, have connived at any fraud or peculation in this case, because no fraud has ever been committed. It is true that, on one or two occasions, the Secretary of the Treasury wrote to Mr. Spencer requesting him to inform that Department why it was that he had not deposited the whole of the money which he had received. To these inquiries satisfactory answers were received. And, if I am correctly informed, Mr. Spencer always has been, and now is, esteemed in Indiana, his native State, as a gentleman of unimpeachable integrity.

The next case to which I will ask the attention of the House is that of Mr. Reckless, the late collector of the customs at Perth Amboy, New Jersey.

This case, like the former, is peculiarly unfortunate for the gentlemen who are so very anxious to impeach the character of the Secretary of the Treasury. During the eight years in which Mr. Reckless was collector of the customs, he was in three or four instances requested by the Secretary of the Treasury to make further deposits, unless the sum retained in his hands was required to discharge debenture certificates. To these communications replies were returned by Mr. Reckless; and, sir, had the Secretary of the Treasury been permitted to have furnished this House with those replies, they would have satisfied every candid mind of the entire emptiness of all this vituperation against all those who were connected with these transactions. But such was the peculiar phraseology of the resolution upon which this report was founded, that the Secretary was denied the opportunity to give the answers made to his inquiries by any of the public officers whose names are mentioned in that report. Mr. Reckless, however, never was a defaulter—never had any intention of defrauding the Government; neither does the Government pretend to have any claim upon that gentleman, either in law or equity, for one cent. So far, therefore, the allegations made against the Secretary of the Treasury are wholly unfounded. As to the charge made by Mr. Reckless for boat hire, although it was not conformable to law, yet it is very clear that he had no wish or intent to defraud the Government; and, on being informed by the Department that such charges could not be allowed, the money was paid into the Treasury. As I before stated, therefore, the Government has not suffered a loss of one cent by Mr. Reckless.

Let us, in the next place, examine the defalcations of the Chief Engineer, General Gratiot. I admit that this public functionary has committed a fraud upon the Government, and for which he has been promptly dismissed from office by the Chief Magistrate of the United States. The most prompt and efficient measures have been adopted, also, to save the Government from suffering any loss in consequence of the unfaithfulness of that officer. But for the purpose of establishing the position which Mr. Woodbury's accusers have assumed, the case of General Gratiot is quite as unfortunate as those which have already been mentioned. The House will please to recollect that the above-named defaulter belonged to the War Department, and was wholly accountable to that Department for any misdemeanors which he may have committed. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot be held responsible for the conduct of that officer with any more propriety than he can for the conduct of every military officer of the Army of the United States. It would be extremely ridiculous, therefore, for any one to pretend that there has been any neglect or connivance on the part of Mr. Woodbury relative to the defalcation of General Gratiot.

This brings me to the consideration of the receivers of public moneys in Illinois and Mississippi. No one will pretend to deny that Mr. Linn, Mr. Boyd, and Mr. Harris are defaulters, and that, in consequence, they have long since left the public service. But, for one, I do deny that either of those cases furnishes any evidence which can, in the slightest degree, implicate the character of the Secretary of the Treasury. These gentlemen were recommended to the Executive of the United States as men of punctuality, honesty, and fidelity, and upon these testimonials, General Jackson gave them the appointments which they and their friends solicited; and even now, although these men are in default to the Government, there is no one who will pretend that either of these men would, with a corrupt intent, defraud the Government. During the years of 1835 and '36, thousands broke away from the sober, every-day business of life, and went headlong into the most wild and hazardous speculations. These three individuals were swept along with this strong and impetuous current, until they, as well as thousands of others as heedless as themselves, were overwhelmed in debts which they could not discharge.

The sin that lies at the door of these three officers of the Government, is, in entering lands for themselves, for which they had no means of making payment. In my opinion, to this may be traced all their delinquencies to the Government, and it is in that way that they now are indebted to the United States. But, sir, there is not the least particle of evidence to show that the Secretary of the Treasury had any reason to suspect that these men were engaged in hazardous speculations. He very well knew that they were at times delinquent in making the public deposits, and for this neglect they as often received from him the most unqualified disapprobation and reproof. As evidence of Mr. Woodbury's vigilance, perseverance, and fidelity in the discharge of his duty in relation to this branch of the public service, I will call the attention of the House to some extracts of letters written by that gentleman to the above-named delinquents. In a letter to Mr. Linn of 1834, Mr. Woodbury says, that, unless he should exhibit to the Department satisfactory evidence of his having made the deposits prior to the first day of December following, accompanied by a statement showing his receipts and disbursements, and the balance with which he was chargeable at the time of such deposit, "it will be my painful duty to submit the case for the action of the Executive, and to recommend the appointment of another person as your successor."

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

The President's Annual Message—Mr. Cushman.

HO. OF REPS.

Again, in the year 1835, the Secretary of the Treasury writes to Mr. Harris as follows: "I regret that there should be occasion to call your attention to the omission to render your monthly duplicate returns to this office, for the months of November and December, and to remind you that punctuality in this respect is indispensable." Again, in the year 1837, the Secretary writes to Mr. Boyd in the following language: "I have to inform you that your resignation is accepted, to take effect on the first day of the present month, and a successor will be appointed. The district attorney will be instructed to exercise as much indulgence as the public interest will permit, in relation to the adjustment of your concerns." Here we see the language of a man, who has, himself, during the whole course of his life, been remarkable for punctuality and close attention to business, offering advice, admonition, and reproof to those who had disregarded these estimable qualifications. There we find no neglect on the part of the Secretary—no conniving or winking at fraud or corruption in any officer of the Government; but a firm determination that those defaulters should either be faithful in the performance of their duties to the Government, or leave the public service.

The public service they have left, but not without being required to settle the claims which the United States had against them, and to give that security which, it is hoped, will insure the ultimate payment of those claims. But whether this will be the case or not, there may be an honest difference of opinion. It has been said by some gentlemen, not, however, in public debate, that as fast as men became defaulters and are dismissed from office, they join the Federal party. If this be the fact with the above-mentioned cases, I should think that it might be somewhat doubtful whether those debts would be paid; but if these men still hold to their political integrity, that fact would go very far towards convincing me that those claims would finally be extinguished by an honest payment. But whether these debts shall ever be paid to the Government, is immaterial as to the issue which is now before the country. That is, whether the Secretary of the Treasury was, in any way or manner, instrumental in producing the results which have been mentioned? This is the question, and I am fully persuaded that any man who knows Mr. Woodbury will answer in the negative.

I am confirmed in this opinion by a recent expression of a portion of the people of New Hampshire, relative to this distinguished statesman. More than eight months after this document relative to defaulting collectors, &c., was published to the world, and after the sovereign people had had time to "read and reflect" upon the subject, at a large Democratic convention, held in the county of Strafford, a county containing a population of nearly sixty thousand inhabitants, on the 19th December last, the following resolution was adopted: "That the Hon. Levi Woodbury, the public financier and statesman, merits the warmest approval of his countrymen, especially those of his native State, for the distinguished, unflinching, and efficient aid he has rendered the national Executive in those trying exigencies which have occurred during the preceding and present Administration." Here, sir, is a testimonial from a portion of the intelligent and virtuous yeomanry of New Hampshire, who are as competent to decide upon a question of this sort as ourselves, approving of the conduct of Mr. Woodbury in the strongest and most comprehensive manner. Against testimony like this, a few unsupported denunciations can have no influence. Such a course must injure the assailant more than him who is assailed.

Sir, I ask those gentlemen who have conducted this assault upon the Administration, why it is that they make at this time such a boisterous outcry against Mr. Woodbury, for giving a little indulgence to a few receivers of money for the sales of public lands? Let me remind those gentlemen, as well as this House and the country, of what took place in 1837. I ask those gentlemen to reconcile, if they can, their conduct on that occasion with the course they have thought proper to pursue at the present time. Beside the indulgence then given before suit, to near eighty banks, as deposit agents, from May to October of the year above mentioned, for twenty millions of dollars at first, and then for five or six millions, the Treasury Department gave time and indulgence to numerous merchants, on duty bonds, during the same period, for nearly five millions more, THOUGH ALL WERE IN DEFAULT TO THE GOVERNMENT. This was the exercise of a sound and legal discretion, and proved, in the end, beneficial to the United States. Congress sanctioned all this in September of the same year, and extended the indulgence still further. Both of these happened, also, after real defaults had been ascertained, and were not previously, like the short time taken by the Department and the President, exercising the same sound and legal discretion, in the case of the receivers, to inquire if a real default had occurred, and the money would not, without suit, be deposited as ordered. Yet the hue and cry is, that the last is impeachable, but the first was right! What glaring inconsistency and miserable caviling!

Mr. Chairman, it has been said, also, that this same document proves forty other cases of default, as gross as those which have been named. This, I presume, must have been intended as a mere figure of speech, for I can find nothing in that document to warrant me in coming to any such conclusion. My impression is, that the great body of evidence is the other way. If gentlemen will examine the reports made to the Department by Mr. West and Mr. Ganesche, they will be satisfied that there are but few other cases of neglect on the part of receivers of public moneys, and that most of the land offices were extremely well conducted. In proof of this fact, I will refer the House to the following extracts from the reports of those gentlemen, merely as a sample. Mr. Ganesche, in speaking of the officers in Louisiana, says: "The two officers bear very good characters. They are both intelligent and, as far as I could judge, disposed to do justice, and to accommodate every one." Mr. West, in his report upon the office at Mineral Point, Wisconsin, says: "As to the state of the office, it is now, upon the whole, satisfactory, and all the books appear to be well kept." The receiver states the reason why he did not take to St. Louis, in December, 1835, all the money to deposit, was that the bank would not receive some of the New England paper which he had taken for land, and which would be received at Detroit, when he should make a deposit there. I could continue my quotations to a much greater extent, to show that the land offices in other States are kept to the entire satisfaction, both of the Government and the people, but I think it wholly unnecessary. Enough has been adduced, I trust, to prove that the above document is not what it has been represented to be by the enemies of the Administration.

The last case which has been produced, for the purpose of following up the attack upon Mr. Woodbury, and, through him, upon the Administration and its friends, is that of Samuel Swartwout, the late collector of New York. It is true that soon after General Jackson came into office, he appointed the above-named individual collector of the customs at the great commercial emporium of the country. This was done, however, contrary to the wishes of many distinguished members of the Democratic party, who were better acquainted with that individual than that enlightened, upright, honest, and single-minded statesman. But so strongly were his pretensions urged upon the consideration of the Executive, that the appointment was given to him. It seems, from what has been said here, as well as elsewhere, that Mr. Swartwout rendered himself so acceptable to the merchants of New York during the first four years that he filled that station, that they, with one accord, recommended his reappointment to that office; and, as extraordinary as may be the fact, from the time of his appointment to November last, there was nothing known, or overt, upon which to rest a suspicion against the fidelity of Mr. Swartwout. At this time, a report was made to the Treasury Department that Mr. Swartwout had defrauded the Government out of one million and a quarter of the public revenues of the country.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] and other leaders of the Opposition in this House, have commented upon this case with great severity, but I think with very trifling effect. They say that, admitting that no peculations upon the Government funds were discovered while Mr. Swartwout continued in office, yet he left the office on the 28th day of March last, and of course that this enormous fraud must have been discovered prior to November, the time mentioned in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. This at first view may seem to be plausible; but when we come to take into consideration the requirements of law, and the magnitude of the business which comes from this one office, it might be quite as surprising that the defalcation was detected so soon as it was. I admit that Mr. Swartwout went out of office on the 28th day of March last. But the law gave him three months to make out and transmit his quarterly accounts to the Department; and, as heretofore observed, such has been the magnitude of business at that office, that the collector has generally been indulged with some weeks, and occasionally with a month of time, more than that allowed by law; all of which was taken in the present instance, so that these accounts were not received at the First Comptroller's office until the middle of July or the first of August last.

Well, sir, before Mr. Woodbury could know anything relative to the accounts between Mr. Swartwout and the Government, they must be examined by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury. Will any gentleman pretend that the quarterly accounts of the collector of New York—a place where three fourths of the revenue of the country, on imports, is collected—can be examined, audited, or settled, in a day, a week, or a month? No, sir, there is not a gentleman here, or elsewhere, whose mind can embrace the magnitude of the business of that office, who will not willingly allow to any accounting officer three months, at least, to accomplish such a Herculean task. Well, sir, grant this fact, which is one that must, as I think, be granted by every candid man, I then ask how was Mr. Woodbury to be apprised of the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout on the first of August, not more than fifteen days, at most, after the accounts reached the First Comptroller's office, so as to have prevented his escape to England in the Great Western? This was impossible. On the first of August, when Mr. Swartwout left the country, the First Auditor of the Treasury could not have given to those accounts even a cursory reading. Much less could he have audited the accounts, so that a statement could have been reported to the Secretary of the Treasury; and until such a report is made, no orders whatever can issue from that Department. If I am right, sir, in this estimate, as I most truly believe that I am, then the charge of negligence in duty, and connivance at fraud, falls to the ground in this case, as well as in all those which have been previously disposed of. Yes, sir, truly may it be said that Mr. Woodbury hath come out of this war of words and of calumny without receiving the least possible injury.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen from Virginia and Mississippi, [Mr. WISE and Mr. PRENTISS,] as well as others, have made the report, which we have just been considering, the foundation of much invective against the Executive of the United States, as well as the whole Democratic party. Sir, it may be that the Chief Magistrate of the United States is often maltreated by this department of the Government from the want of consideration. It would be well for us, probably, to be more often reminded, that our Government is divided into three important branches, the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial, and that these several branches of the Government are entitled to great respect and decorum, one from the other. We ought to remember that the President of the United States stands in as near a relation to the people as ourselves, save that he is elected for four years, and we for two years only. But while each of us stand here as the representative of fifty thousand inhabitants, the Chief Magistrate is the representative of more than fifteen millions. Although this House is the grand inquest of the nation, and as such, is bound to inquire into the misconduct of public officers, yet I think we ought not to be reduced to such a state of degradation as to mouse about the Executive Departments, to see whether there be anything or not worthy of reprehension. In a community like ours, so intelligent and watchful, and at the same time possessed of so many sources of information, fraud, in a public servant, cannot, for any great length of time, lie concealed. And although I will not yield up my right as a Representative, to ferret out fraud wherever and whenever it may exist, yet I will never degrade myself by bestowing unmerited abuse upon a coordinate branch of the Government.

Sir, the same principles and the same motives which elevated a Jefferson, a Madison, and a Monroe to the Chief Magistracy, raised up the present enlightened and distinguished Chief Magistrate of the United States, as well as his illustrious predecessor. And, sir, although honest principles are an indispensable requisite for men who fill this exalted station, yet this is not enough. We must have men of talents, men of uncompromising integrity, men of high intellectual and moral culture. Such must be the qualifications of those who would wish to preside over the destinies of the American people. In my humble judgment, such are the men who have, for the last ten years, and who do now, compose the American Cabinet. Men who have been so educated that they would not, for a moment, tolerate anything which was wrong, either in themselves or in others over whom they possessed control. Men whose feelings, motives, and conduct, are in perfect accordance with the pure principles of the whole Democratic party, of which they are members; that everything appertaining to the affairs of the people, should be done openly, as in the clear light of the meridian sun. I will sustain no man, or body of men, who would conceal a single act in the administration of the Government, from the sovereignty of the nation—the people.

That was the character of the past, and is the character of the present Administration. Their desire is that every public act should be proclaimed, as it were, upon the house top, so as to keep themselves continually before the tribunal of an enlightened, virtuous, and magnanimous people. When I utter these sentiments, I feel well persuaded that I utter the sentiments of the whole Democratic party of the country. And, sir, could the voice of the people of this wide-spread country be united as the voice of one man, and as it will be united in the year eighteen hundred and forty, in the reflection of the present enlightened and patriotic statesman who is now so ably, wisely, and judiciously administering the Government, that voice would utter, in the honest pride of a grateful people, that the Executive of the United States, for talents, for fidelity, and for high moral and intellectual culture, is not surpassed by any cabinet council upon the face of the earth. Can any one believe, for a moment, that such men can themselves practice fraud, or tolerate such a base and infamous crime in others? No, sir; such a thing is impossible. Every act of the Administration has repelled, and is continuing to repel, every supposition of that character.

Sir, notwithstanding the purity of intention in which the Government is administered, we are, at times, obliged to sit here, day after day, and hear the character of those public servants, who have been elevated to office, in part, through the instrumentality of my constituents, assailed in language highly unbecoming, as I think, to any gentleman who has been honored with a seat in an American Congress. A day or two since, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] observed, "that the two last Administrations were conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity." That their whole course "had been marked by corruption, extravagance, and profligacy." These are bold charges upon the people who elect, as well as upon those who are elected to office. Sir, I repel those charges. They are unfounded. Extravagance or profligacy is an unnecessary expenditure of money. Neither the Administration of General Jackson, or Mr. Van Buren, can with any propriety be charged with such expenditures. It is very true, that the question has repeatedly been asked by gentlemen upon this floor, why it was that the expenditures of the Government should have increased from $13,000,000, as they were under Mr. Adams's administration, up to $35,000,000 or $40,000,000.

I well remember that a question of this kind was asked at the early part of the last session of Congress, by a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] I remember, too, that that question was published in all the Federal papers in New Hampshire, previous to the last annual election, in glaring capitals, so that the wayfaring man might read and understand. Read and understand what, sir! The truth? No, sir; but read and understand that which would best subserve the interests of the demagogue. This is deception, for a more unfounded insinuation was never made. There was no year of Mr. Adams's administration in which the whole expenditures did not exceed $22,000,000, instead of only $13,000,000, as was asserted by implication, or directly, by that gentleman. And, sir, in order to place this subject in its true light before the people, that they may have the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, I have prepared the following table, taking the first four years of Mr. Monroe's administration, the four years of Mr. Adams's administration, and the first four years of General Jackson's administration, by which it appears that, in

Since the period last mentioned, the ordinary expenses of the Government have been increased, and, together with the extraordinary expenditures, have made the whole amount of the disbursements of the Government, for a few years past, what they were in 1817, nearly forty millions. But in all this there is no mystery, excepting to him who has no desire to understand the truth. Let us take into consideration the permanent increase which has been made to the army of the United States—the extraordinary increase of the pension roll—the building of light-houses, custom-houses, and improvement of harbors—the rebuilding of the Treasury Department and the Patent Office—the payment of Indian annuities, and the extinguishment of titles to Indian lands—the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi—to all which are to be added the large appropriations which have been made in consequence of the Black Hawk war, the Seminole, and other Indian hostilities. Here is the plain and incontrovertible answer to the question, not why the whole expenditures of the Government have increased from thirteen millions to thirty-five millions or forty millions, but why they have been increased from twenty-four millions, as they were under Mr. Adams's administration, to thirty-nine millions, as they were under Mr. Monroe's administration.

The Federalists have seized upon the great amount of the public expenditures as a fruitful theme of detraction, and of wanton attack upon the whole Democratic party. We often hear it said that we came into power in 1829, bearing upon our lips the promise of retrenchment and reform, but that we have been entirely faithless to that promise. But bold assertions can deceive no one, unless he is very much predisposed to self-deception. I could show, had I time so to do, that the above-mentioned promise has been kept, so far as the Executive of the United States or its friends had the power, to the very letter. I shall stop here, however, to give only one illustration of this truth; that is, the reform which ought never to be forgotten, a reform in the system of internal improvements by the General Government, whereby more than one hundred and sixty millions of the people's money has been saved by a timely and judicious interposition of the veto power. Other reforms could be mentioned, but that is enough to answer for all the clamor upon that subject. The causes of the extraordinary expenditures of the Government have all been spread before the American people; and they have seen, with deep regret, the large but unavoidable appropriations which have been made to meet the expenses of the Indian wars. But these expenditures have been, and will continue to be, met by the Democracy of the country with as much cheerfulness as were the expenses of the war by which our independence was achieved, or those attendant upon the war of 1812, to preserve and perpetuate that independence.

The residue of these extraordinary expenditures have been for objects in which the people have felt a very deep interest. Therefore, all the appropriations for those objects have met with their cordial approbation. We have, to be sure, paid out large sums of money for the extinguishment of titles to Indian lands, but that money is not lost. There we have our money's worth in lands. And I feel perfectly persuaded that all the expenses which have heretofore attended, or which may hereafter attend, the colonization of the Indians will be met without a murmur. That heaven-inspired benevolence which projected and executed the removal of the red man to the west side of the Mississippi, will reflect a glory upon the administrations of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren, the effluence of which will continue to increase so long as true wisdom and philanthropy shall be held in esteem among men. This is a measure to which all the true friends of the red man have looked forward with great solicitude. This was their last fond hope for the preservation of those native sons of the forest. But, sir, when the extinguishment of Indian titles shall have been completed, and the sword shall again return to its scabbard, or be beaten into the plowshare, our annual expenditures will at once come down to sixteen or seventeen millions.

Mr. Chairman, during the debate upon the subject now before the House, the old tune of proscription has been again revived. But, sir, upon this subject, I would not utter one word, were it not for the mean and contemptible hypocrisy of the Opposition upon this subject. It reminds me of the cry of fire from the incendiary, or the cry of thief from the midnight robber—first commit the offense, and then give the alarm with the hope of escaping detection. One article in the Democratic creed is that, under a Government like ours, there is no such thing as a vested right to an office. That occasional changes are productive of great good to the country, and that whether the "spoils belong to the victors" or not, it is the imperious duty of every administration to surround itself with trustworthy and confidential political friends. This the Democratic party openly avow to be just and right, and not only just and proper, but just as natural as it is for the householder to bring into his family circle his personal friends, and his personal friends only, those who will render the most efficient aid in the preservation of peace and harmony around the domestic fireside. For all this the master of the house is held responsible. In like manner the President of the United States is held responsible for the efficient and faithful manner in which all the affairs of his administration are to be executed. Who are the most likely to conduct the subordinate affairs of the Government with the most efficiency and fidelity, his friends or his foes? His reliance must be upon his political friends, and not his political enemies. The interest, happiness, prosperity, honor, and glory of the country will, in that case, be identified with the Chief Magistrate and his political friends. On the other hand, his political enemies, should they be continued in office, might be faithless for the sole purpose of bringing him and the administration into disrepute or disgrace.

Notwithstanding we avow this to be a sound Democratic principle, yet we are not disposed to carry it so fully into practice as the Federalists, who pretend to deny any such right. In proof of this fact, I will call the attention of the House to the present state of things in this District. It is believed that three fourths of the subaltern officers and clerks in the public offices in this city are Federalists. Look, sir, through the civil list throughout the country; many who are opposed to the Administration will be found holding office under the Government. This was the case with the late collector at New York, as well as his cashier and his assistant cashier. Other cases might be adduced to show, even in that Department, that many are holding offices who are opposed to the Administration. Cast your eye, sir, through the Army and the Navy of the United States. There it will be found that a large majority of the officers are Federalists; against this influence, as well as against the combined influence of all the corporate power in the several States, the Democracy of the country has been compelled to contend. And, sir, let gentlemen say what they please relative to executive patronage, and executive influence, through the medium of Democratic office-holders of the General Government, excepting so far as that influence is connected with truth, it has not the weight of a feather, when compared to the all-pervading influence of the corporate money power of the country, wielded generally by a vindictive Opposition.

But, sir, for the Federalists to talk about proscription, or removal from office for opinions' sake, is to charge themselves with the basest hypocrisy. Although they pretend to deny the propriety of such a course, and to impugn the motives of others for carrying such a principle into practice, yet, sir, when they happen to rise into power, upon a delusive panic of their own creation, not a single Democrat is permitted to remain in office so long as that dynasty continues. In proof of this fact, I need only refer the House to the clean sweep which was made in the State of Maine during the past year. There every Democrat who could be reached by executive power was at once removed from office; and it is a well known fact that such is their practice whenever and wherever they have the ascendancy; and their moral sensibilities must be greatly blunted for them to talk about proscription on our part, without suffusing their cheeks with a crimson blush.

Mr. Chairman, the American people are too enlightened to receive declamation for argument, or harsh epithets as evidence of unworthiness of character. Arraign any man who has uniformly sustained a good character before the great tribunal of public opinion, he may be as sure of an honorable acquittal as that the light of day will succeed the darkness of night, unless the allegations are supported by conclusive testimony. It is upon this ground that I support the men now in power. I have heard them charged with high crimes and misdemeanors, but no proof has been exhibited to substantiate those charges; and as they agree with the great body of the American people in the true principles of self-government, I ought to render them my cordial support; and the present Executive of the United States, as well as all future Executives of like principles, and of like character, will be cordially, zealously, and perseveringly sustained by the whole Democracy of the country. Neither they, nor their successors, have anything to fear so long as they continue as they have in good works.

It must be admitted by every American citizen whose mind is not perverted by prejudice, that more has been done during the last ten years to promote the great mercantile interests of the country, than has been done in any other like period since the establishment of the Government. Divers compacts and arrangements, during the above-mentioned period, have been made, which have opened new channels of commercial enterprise and national prosperity. During the same period, also, the Government has demanded, and in pursuance of such demand, has received more than ten millions of money as indemnities for depredations upon our commerce by foreign nations. This sum has not only been received, but has also been paid out by the Government, to the several claimants, without the loss of a single dollar. This shows a care and fidelity, in conducting the financial affairs of the Government, which is worthy of all praise. Furthermore, the people of the United States may rest assured that, since the Independent Treasury system has been in operation, the Government has not suffered loss to the amount of one dollar, excepting by the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, a fraud which that man has been perpetrating for the last seven or eight years.

If the Executive of the United States has been able to accomplish such wonders without legislative aid, what may it not accomplish when that important system shall be regulated by law. Then may we have a reasonable expectation that losses will not occur for the future; but we may also expect to witness greater stability in all our commercial operations, and consequently experience a much greater degree of national prosperity and happiness than we hitherto have done.

DEFALCATION OF SAMUEL SWARTWOUT.

REMARKS OF HON. ELI MOORE, OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 19, 1839,

On the Resolution to appoint a Committee to investigate the Swartwout Defalcation.

Mr. MOORE rose, and remarked that this was a strange state of things. Gentlemen on the other side (said he) have suddenly assumed a new and strange position in regard to this matter. But a few days ago they told us that there could be no satisfactory investigation without a fair and impartial committee. A committee in which the parties stood six to three would neither act impartially according to their declaration, nor secure the confidence of the public. They must, they said, wrest from the Chair the power of choosing the committee, for the reason that he would pack a committee so as to suit the purposes of his friends. They desired no unfair advantage for themselves. Oh! no; all they wanted was an impartial committee. They wanted fair play, and nothing more. Well, sir, we assured them that they should have what they asked for, and that we were as desirous as they could be of a satisfactory investigation. How have they carried out their professions by their acts? In the first place, we agreed that the committee should be chosen by the House; and, in order that the whole country might see and know how and by whom they were chosen, we proposed to choose them openly, and viva voce. In this way, everything would be done fairly, openly, and in the face of the country. But, no; gentlemen would not assent to this. They insisted that the committee must be chosen by a secret ballot. They must be sheltered, sequestered, hidden, or they could not give an honest vote or make a fair choice. Well, sir, they got their secret ballot, and, according to their professions, they were then ready and enabled to select a fair committee. But what have they done? Why, sir, they have been guilty of the very unfairness which they apprehended from the Chair, if the choice were left to him. They have packed a committee upon us. They will not even allow us the three to six, which they complained was the proportion that the Speaker allowed to them. Have they given us three members of our own choice; men whom we would select to represent the character and interests of the Administration? No, sir. The Speaker, upon whom they charged such gross partiality, allowed them three members, who, of all others, were most acceptable to the Opposition, and would have been selected by the Opposition. But the gentlemen, in packing their committee, manifest an unwillingness to allow a single Democratic member of our own choice to serve upon it. Not one of the members whom they have chosen for us was voted for by a single Democratic member on this floor. In a word, the committee is, out and out, one of their own choice, and we have no part in it.

In order, sir, to bring this matter to a close, and to prevent any misunderstanding, I deem it my duty to announce in my place that no Democrat, who is elected in opposition to the wishes of the Democratic party on this floor, will consent to serve on the committee, unless compelled by a vote of the House; and, sir, any one who will voluntarily serve on the committee, under such circumstances, I denounce as a traitor to the party, and a conspirator with the Opposition. Now, sir, I propose to the House, in order to save time, and bring this matter to a close, that gentlemen carry their plan a little further. I propose that they select a Whig committee, out and out. Let them do that, and we shall be satisfied. We are willing that they should take their own men, and make their own report: we will be perfectly well satisfied with such a committee and such a report: we court investigation, and an investigation made by Whig members. But gentlemen will not accede to this; and why? Why will they not take the whole charge and responsibility of the investigation? Why should they wish to give us a nominal part in it? Is it because they apprehend that their Whig report will be distrusted by the country? Is it so, sir? Do they, indeed, entertain such an opinion of their own integrity and fairness, as to doubt whether their statements will obtain credence with the American people? Are they convinced, from their own knowledge of the estimation in which their frankness and magnanimity is held, that their report, as a Whig report, will be received with distrust and suspicion? What, sir? Shall this party, that lays claim to so much ability and integrity, ay, and exclusive piety, and which is "manifested daily in their lives and conversation," shall this party have doubts whether their report will be believed? Yes, sir, that is the case; that is the secret of the operations going on around us;

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Salt Duties, Fishing Bounties, and Allowances—Mr. Williams.

SENATE.

this accounts for the strange state of things that we now witness. How have gentlemen arrived at this result? Not by reasoning, for that is not their habit, but by instinct. They know instinctively, sir, that the stomach of the public sense will revolt at any report coming from such a source; and hence their anxiety to have some Democrats of their own election on the committee, to indorse their statements on this floor, and thereby give them credence with the public.

I warn gentlemen that they cannot pack this committee so as to deceive the people. We have shown them our ticket. They know the names of the three out of nine whom the friends of the Administration on this floor wish to choose. They have refused to select these men. It is not my intention to impugn the character of the Democratic gentlemen who have been elected. I know them to be capable and honest; and I further know, sir, that they will not serve unless compelled by a vote of the House.

Mr. PRENTISS here rose, and interrupted the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MOORE refused to yield the floor.

Mr. PRENTISS said he wished to make a point of order.

Mr. MOORE. I debate no questions of order; it is not my habit. Gentlemen are welcome to the floor.

SALT DUTIES, FISHING BOUNTIES AND ALLOWANCES.

SPEECH OF HON. R. WILLIAMS,

OF MAINE,

IN SENATE, January 29, 1839,

On the motion of Mr. BENTON for leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the Salt duty and Fishing bounties.

Mr. WILLIAMS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The bill which the Senator from Missouri proposes to introduce, has for its object the repeal of the duty now imposed upon salt, and the abolition of the bounty granted to vessels employed in the cod and mackerel fishery; and I regret that the Senator has desired that the vote upon granting leave to bring in this bill shall be considered as a test vote; that those voting for granting the leave shall be considered as friendly to the passage of the bill, when introduced, and that those voting against it shall be considered as opposed to its passage. By this course the Senator has the advantage of appearing before the nation as the mover and advocate of a proposition to relieve the people from a tax upon salt, while others, willing to go further than this bill proposes to go, may be represented as unwilling to do anything toward removing any of the burdens imposed upon the community. For myself, I would gladly vote to grant the leave to bring in this bill, in the hope that, in its progress, other articles might be included, the tax upon which is more oppressive, and more unequal in its operation upon the different portions of the Union, than is the tax proposed to be repealed by this bill. If the honorable Senator had included in his bill the articles of coal, breadstuff, beef and pork, iron, sugar, molasses, and lead, and proposed to repeal or modify the duties upon them as well as upon salt, he should have my vote; but as he chooses to confine his bill to one article, viz: salt, and has coupled the repeal of the fishing bounty with the repeal of the duty upon salt, I must vote against it for reasons which I intend briefly to state.

And here let me ask, Mr. President, why it is that, at this short session, and at this advanced stage of it, we should be presented with a bill to repeal the duty on the single article of salt, and leave the duty upon all other articles untouched? and why the Senator from Missouri should feel himself called upon, not only to introduce the bill now, but to announce his determination to devote himself, from this time forth, to the abolition of this execrable tax, as he calls it? Have we heard from the people any complaints of the tax upon salt? Are there any petitions asking for its repeal? Have the Legislatures of any of the States asked for its abolition? Not one. Does this tax operate more severely upon the State which the honorable Senator so ably represents, or upon the entire West, than upon other portions of the Union? So far from this being the fact, the reverse of it is true; and why? Because the western country is blessed with salt springs, from which most of the salt consumed in that portion of the Union is manufactured at home, and the domestic article is cheaper than the foreign salt can be transported to them, even if there was no duty upon the article, and probably cheaper than the cost of transportation from New Orleans, if salt could be had there for nothing. It may be, and probably is, true that foreign salt is required and used in the West to cure their beef and pork intended for exportation, but this constitutes but a very small part of the whole consumption of the vast West. It is not so with the Atlantic States; they have no salt springs near the sea-board, and, although they manufacture some salt, it is still true that most of the salt imported from abroad is consumed in the Atlantic States and in the fisheries. If this be so, and I submit to the Senate if it be not so, why, I ask, should the West be first to move in the business of abolishing the duty upon salt? If they regard the duty upon salt as a burden upon them, should they not be willing to consider that other portions of the Union bear equal and greater burdens? Nay, more; should they not remember that they have an equivalent, and more than an equivalent, in the tax upon breadstuffs, upon beef and pork, and upon lead, all which articles they produce in abundance, and sell to other portions of the Union at an enhanced price in consequence of the duty upon them? If they wish to have their salt free of duty, let us, who are obliged to purchase breadstuffs, and beef and pork, have these articles free of duty, also, or at such prices as those articles would be sold at if they were free. Why should the surplus produce of the West be protected by heavy duties, and thus enhanced in price to the consumers in other States? There can be no reason for it unless it be that in the general arrangement of the tariff other portions of the Union have an equivalent in being favored in their productions. But would the removal of the duty on salt be felt at all by the western States? Not unless the price of salt would fall in consequence of taking off the duty; and that such would not be the fact is fairly to be inferred from the experience which has already been had by the country while the tax has been in the process of reduction, and the prices of the article not affected by it, as has been shown by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. If, then, the West have no burdens to complain of, and in fact do not complain of the duty upon salt, so far as Congress are informed, by petition or otherwise, I ask again, why it is that the Senator from Missouri should bring his great power and talents to bear upon the small remnant of tax, now less than six cents per bushel, upon salt? The Senator says it is an execrable tax—a curse and an abomination—a tax upon the beneficence of God. It is true that salt is an article of necessity, and used as much by the poor as by the rich, and hence should be afforded at the least possible cost; but how it is that the Senator should put all the horror and detestation which he manifests and expresses on this occasion at the small remnant of tax upon salt, and at the same time forgets or omits to mention other articles of equal necessity to the poor and to the rich, and much more important in respect of the duty or tax upon them—I mean breadstuffs, beef, pork, sugar, iron, coal, &c., I am at a loss to understand. It cannot be that he does not esteem them of equal necessity and general use, or that the tax upon them is not greater than the tax upon salt. Why are not the duties upon all and upon each of these articles execrable, a curse, and an abomination, a tax upon the beneficence of God? The Senator does not, and I think cannot tell us, and yet in his bill he does not name one of them, nor in his able speech does he intimate an intention of relieving the people from any portion of the existing duties upon them. If these articles, or even a part of them, were included in his bill, I would rejoice to see it introduced and acted upon. Then my constituents, as well as the Senator's, would share in the benefits of passing such a bill. But his bill proposes no such thing; it provides simply for the repeal of the salt duty and fishing bounty, for the benefit of his constituents, and thereby taking from mine the only item in your whole legislation which goes, in any degree, to compensate my section of country for the most grievous and unequal operation of the present tariff; and here, as in the declaration of the honorable Senator, that the fishing bounty went to the benefit of a particular section, and that he looked for opposition to his bill from that section, must be found the motive for bringing forward this bill at this time, and pressing it with so much power and perseverance. With this impression, it becomes my duty to resist the attempt to produce such great injustice to my constituents as would follow from the passage of the bill now proposed. In a country so extended as is ours, embracing almost every climate, and engaged in such a variety of pursuits, it is not to be expected that duties upon articles will operate equally upon the pursuits and business of our citizens in different sections of the Union; and while a tax upon one article may, as it often does, be borne principally by the men and business of the East, and have little or no practical operation in the West, a tax upon some other article may be borne principally by the West, and have very little influence on the business and prosperity of the East. Hence it is that the business of forming a tariff is and ought to be the result of comparison, equalization, and compromise, in which the various interests and pursuits of all parts of the Union shall be duly respected, and the necessary burdens for the support of the General Government be so distributed upon the various sections of the country, as to come as near as possible to equality as a whole. We now have a tariff of duties which, I admit, is very far from being just or equal in its exactions and impositions upon the several sections of the Union, and bears most oppressively and injuriously upon the business and pursuits of those whom I have the honor, in part, to represent. Still as the bounty to fishing vessels is the only equivalent, and that a very imperfect one, for the severe and ruinous taxes upon our most important branch of business, it must be apparent to every liberal mind, that, if this boon be taken away, some of the burdens bearing peculiarly hard upon the people and business of my State should fall with it. By the compromise act, as it is called, the duties upon all articles are in process of gradual and rapid reduction, and in 1842 the tax upon salt will have come down to two cents per bushel, or thereabouts; and it seems admitted on all hands, that the time is near when the whole subject of the tariff must be considered and adjusted. The sooner the better for my State; and I will go with the honorable Senator from Missouri, at any time, for a general revision and modification of the tariff, for the purpose of equalizing the public burdens upon all the States; but not now, or at any other time, for taking any one article separately, whereby the burden upon an oppressed portion of the country should be made more ruinous. Then, again I ask, why not suffer the tax on salt and the fishing bounty to remain until a general revision of the tariff?

The honorable Senator says that the bounty to fishing vessels is an unconstitutional use of the public money. My answer to that objection is, that it was granted under Washington's administration, and has been continued under every succeeding Administration to this day, with a short interruption under that of Mr. Jefferson; and it is reasonable to suppose that the framers of the Constitution, and the wise men in the Government from the adoption of the Constitution to this time, understood what was and what was not constitutional, as well as the honorable Senator; and I am content to put their opinions and their acts against the opinion of the Senator from Missouri. But to test this objection by the acts of the honorable Senator, I would ask how he can contend that the bounty to fishing vessels is unconstitutional when he advocates and votes for bills to grant lands in aid of the construction of canals and railroads; to authorize States and incorporated companies to import railroad iron free of duty; and to authorize a drawback of duties upon such iron upon proof that it has been used in construction of railroads? Is there any principle upon which such gratuities to States and incorporated companies can be defended, which would not apply with more justice and propriety to the bounty to poor fishermen? The Senator surely will not be willing to be represented as advocating and voting gratuities to incorporated companies which he would deny to poor individuals.

Again: we have had repeated applications from persons on the southern and western waters, for authority to import free of duty the manufactured material for iron steamboats; and did the honorable Senator from Missouri ever raise his voice or influence against bills of that description? Is his opposition to the fishing bounty the result of principle against such grants, or must it be ascribed to the fact, that the fishing bounty is for the benefit of the East, and the exemption from duty on iron steamboats for the benefit of the West? Or that, in the former case, the bounty of the Government goes in aid of the poor and meritorious individuals, and in the latter to rich corporations? Again: the Senator from Missouri contends that the bounty to fishing vessels and their crews is unnecessary, because the fishing business is prosperous, and does not require this bounty either in the way of profit to the fishermen, or as encouraging the creation of seamen. I would be happy if the Senator were right in this view; but I regret to say that, so far as I am informed, and have reasons to believe, he labors under great misapprehension upon both points; and it is easy to see how the honorable Senator has fallen into error as to the prosperity of our fisheries. In the tables cited by him, he makes the exports from our fisheries for the year ending 30th of September, 1837, to be $2,600,000, and says that exports of the same article in 1790 were only $1,194,000, intending thereby to show an increase of export in the article of fish of about $1,400,000 in less than fifty years! But what is the fact, as shown by the tables on which the Senator relies? It is this, that of the $2,600,000 exports from the fisheries, only $770,000 proceed from the cod and mackerel fisheries to which alone the bounty to fishing vessels and their crews is extended; and the residue, $1,930,000, are the product of the whale fishery, which has no connection with the fishing bounty. Then, how does the account of prosperity of the cod and mackerel fishery stand? In 1790, the exports of the fisheries (possibly including some oil) were $1,194,000; and in 1837 they were $770,000, showing an actual diminution of exports from our home fisheries of more than $400,000 in a period of nearly fifty years, while the West has been transformed from a wilderness to a galaxy of most prosperous and productive States, with a population of at least five millions. And this is what the honorable Senator from Missouri calls prosperity in an important branch of business in the East. If he can contemplate such a state of business in any section of the Union with pleasure, I am sorry for it.

But aside from the tables adduced by the honorable Senator from Missouri, we have the fact, stated by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis,] that within a few years past the tonnage employed in the cod and mackerel fisheries, was one hundred and sixty thousand; and the tables show that for the year ending September, 1837, that tonnage was less than one hundred and thirty thousand. Besides, sir, living, as I do, in a State where these fisheries are carried on to some extent, I may be permitted to say, that the business of the cod and mackerel fisheries could not be carried on to any advantage, if prosecuted as other branches of business are usually conducted.

And now, it may be asked, why do we pursue it under such circumstances? I will tell you, Mr. President, why and how it is done. Our soil on the sea-board is rocky and sterile; our winters are long and our summers are short; our shores are inhabited by a hardy, industrious, and adventurous population, who, being unable to raise their bread upon the land, resort to that grand bank which never stops payment, and never refuses to discount to the enterprising fisherman sufficient for his subsistence.

And now the honorable Senator from Missouri will probably ask, why do these hardy and enterprising men abandon such a place, and go to the enchanting West, the Garden of Eden? I answer, because they have a home, a family, or friends whom they love, schools for their children, and the means of religious instruction and improvement, which they prize above all the allurements which the rich soil, the mild climate, the abundant productions, and rapid growth of the West, with some apprehension of fever and ague, and other ills can inspire. This may be very wrong in the estimation of some; but so long as these poor men can, by their industry, prudence, and great economy, provide for themselves and families, and keep out of debt, they are happy and contented, good citizens, and well qualified and well disposed to fight the battles of their country when occasion calls for their services. Such are the fishermen who participate in the bounty granted by this Government to fishing vessels; and if the Senator could visit them, see and know their republican habits and feelings, and how hard it is for them to get a living by fishing, I am sure he could not, and would not, desire to take from them the little, and the only favor which has ever been granted to them.

And now, sir, how is the fishing business, under all its embarrassments, carried on? Not by the owners of the vessels, not by employing a master and crew, and providing for their subsistence, as is done in other branches of commerce. No, sir; such a course would be ruinous. Such a course would not command that constant, persevering, and untiring effort, and that rigid economy and self-denial which are indispensable to the success of the cruise, and to avoid a ruinous issue to the enterprise. But, so far as I know, the universal, certainly, the general practice is, that a few hardy, smart, and enterprising fellows club together, who are willing to work hard and live poor, and they find some friend who owns a vessel suitable for the fishing business. They take the vessel upon shares, obtain their salt and the necessary stores for the cruise, to wit: hard bread, pork, tea, molasses, and fishing apparatus, upon credit, to be paid for out of the fish to be caught, and off they go upon a voyage of four months and more, living upon these stinted means, encountering storms and hardships, and often toiling all day and catching no fish, until they have completed their fare, or are compelled to return without it, from stress of weather or the failure of stores; and upon their return they are fortunate if their fare shall sell for enough, with the bounty, to pay their outfits and to procure subsistence for themselves and families until they can make up another voyage.

Thus I have endeavored to represent truly the fishing business as carried on in my own State; and, so far from it being a profitable or prosperous business to those employed in it, it barely gives a living, and that a very poor one, to the hardy, industrious, and persevering men who carry it on in the manner I have stated. Still it is true that, by the labors and privations of our fishermen, a vast quantity of food, and that which is wholesome and cheap, is procured from this source, and has become an article of prime necessity to the poor, and is the cheapest food they can obtain, together with an export to foreign countries of more than $700,000 annually. It should be recollected that all these results proceed from labor, requiring no capital, and impoverishing no man, unless it be those employed in the business. Such an amount of export is not to be disregarded in a national point of view, and but for this source many of our poor citizens would find it impossible to pay for the bread and pork which are sent to them from the West.

But again, the Senator from Missouri contends with great earnestness that the bounty to fishing vessels and crews is unjust, and therefore must be abolished. This, Mr. President, depends upon circumstances. If a bounty were paid from the National Treasury to a particular branch of business, and to a particular section of country, without affording any national benefit, or constituting some equivalent for unequal burdens upon the people or business of that section, then there would be weight in this objection. But how is the fact in this particular? In the first place, I maintain, and the Senator from Massachusetts has demonstrated, that an ample equivalent for the fishing bounty is secured to the Government by the number and goodness of the seamen, which this branch of business furnishes for the navy and commerce of the country; that this benefit was realized in the last war, and will be again whenever this nation shall be engaged in war with any maritime nation. I could not add to the ability and power with which this argument was pressed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and will therefore abstain from attempting it. But upon the other branch of the question, I must say that the portion of this bounty which goes to the fishing vessels and crews of Maine, is nothing like the amount of burdens imposed upon the business of that State, beyond what is borne by any other section or portion of the Union. No other State has so much cause to complain of the existing tariff as Maine has, and no State will be so much benefited as Maine will be by an equitable revision and modification of it. And how is this? It arises from the exorbitant and unreasonable duties levied upon the articles consumed by the people and business of that State. Maine consumes breadstuffs, beef and pork, hams and lead, the produce of the western States, the price of which is enhanced by a protecting duty, but exports none of them. An important item in the business of the East, is ship-building, which necessarily includes the use of large quantities of copper, iron, duck, and cordage, all charged with heavy protecting duties. Maine, with a population of about half a million, owns near one seventh of the whole tonnage of the Union. During the year ending September, 1837, there were built in Maine eighteen ships, forty-five brigs, eighty-two schooners, and four sloops; in all, twenty-three thousand four hundred and seventy-five tons; and, during the same time, ten States, with a population of at least five millions, viz: Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Michigan, built one brig, twenty schooners, and forty-five steamboats; in all, twelve thousand three hundred and fifty-one tons. It is estimated that the duty upon the copper and iron used in building vessels and boats is equal to $3 50 to each ton of vessel or boat. The whole tonnage of Maine, in September, 1837, was two hundred and fifty-one thousand five hundred and fifty-nine tons; and, at the same time, the whole tonnage of the ten States before named, was, forty-eight thousand and ninety tons. It is thus seen that this single branch of business has contributed, for duties on copper and iron used in building vessels and boats, as follows:

Maine, with five hundred thousand inhabitants.....	$880,491
Ten western States, with five millions of inhabitants.....	168,715

being a tax of $1 76 upon each inhabitant of Maine, and only three and one third cents upon each inhabitant of the ten western States. Add to this the further tax upon duck and cordage, and the inequality of burden is enormous and oppressive. In one year, ending September, 1837, Maine paid $82,162 for duty upon copper and iron, used in building twenty-three thousand four hundred and seventy-five tons of vessels, being somewhat over sixteen cents upon each inhabitant; and five millions of persons, in the ten States before named, paid in that year, upon the same articles, only $42,228—less than one cent upon each inhabitant.

Again: it appears from a document obtained from the Register of the Treasury that for the year ending September, 1837, the fishing business of Maine was as follows:

Number of vessels.....	634
Tonnage.....	20,065
Crews.....	2,831
Allowance or bounty.....	$76,175 25

And from all this it is evident that in the year referred to (being the only one for which I have yet obtained the necessary statements) the people of Maine paid, in duties on a single branch of their business, more than the whole amount of fishing bounty obtained by them; and after deducting that bounty from the tax on copper and iron used by them, they still paid a higher tax, in proportion to their population, than the people of the States before named paid in this branch of business.

Is it possible that, upon such a view of the case, Congress will add to the unequal burdens of Maine by repealing the only provision made for their relief? I trust not. If anything be done, open the door, and equalize benefits and burdens to all classes and sections of the whole country. Do something for the relief and encouragement of the commerce and navigation of the country, which are already declining under your unequal and oppressive laws and regulations. Look at the fact that foreign tonnage is fast gaining upon our own; and that, without some modification of your laws, the time is at hand when foreigners will have more of our own trade than our own citizens will enjoy. In 1826 the proportion of foreign tonnage to American tonnage which entered our ports was as one to eight; in 1837 it was as seven to twelve; and in 1837 the entrances and clearances in our ports were as follows:

	Entrances.	Clearances.	Tonnage.	Crews.
American....	6,024	5,942	1,299,720	64,200
Foreign.....	4,632	4,551	765,703	43,073

With such facts before us, is it not our duty to adopt measures to restore American business to American bottoms? to encourage our navigation, and thereby increase our seamen? Then I pray you do not repeal the bounty to fishing vessels, and thus cut off your best nursery for seamen; but rather take off the duty upon copper, iron, duck, and cordage; or, if that cannot be done without injury to other interests, allow a drawback of the duty upon these articles when used in building ships and other vessels. In that way you will encourage American industry and American enterprise, while the effect of passing the proposed bill will be to paralyze both.

SALT DUTY, ETC.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN SENATE, January 29, 1839,

On the motion of Mr. BENTON for leave to introduce a bill to repeal the duty on Salt and the Fishing bounties.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that if the Senator from Missouri had not himself made a special request that the usual courtesy might be waived which required Senators not to oppose the introduction and reference of any bill which a Senator might present, he should not have said one word on the present occasion. There certainly was no gentleman in the Senate to whom he should more cheerfully have extended this courtesy than to the Senator from Missouri. The Senator, however, had called the yeas and nays, and desired to make the introduction of his bill a test question, and to this he could have no objection. He was willing to consider it as such; and briefly to assign the reasons why he should vote against granting him leave to bring in the bill.

I have read (said Mr. B.) with great pleasure and instruction the remarks of the Senator, published in the Globe of last evening, in favor of repealing the duty on the importation of salt, and the fishing bounties and allowances. If this were the session of 1841 or 1842, instead of 1839, I should feel disposed to give great weight to his argument. On one point I consider it conclusive. I think he has demonstrated that the bounty to our fisheries originated exclusively in a drawback of the duties on imported salt in their favor; and that this bounty ought to fall with the repeal of these salt duties, unless it can be sustained on some other principle.

My objection to this bill is, therefore, chiefly founded on the famous compromise act of March, 1833; to the leading provisions of which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. By its terms, all duties on all imported articles, which had, under previous laws, been subject to a duty exceeding twenty per cent. on their value, were to be gradually reduced to this standard. One tenth of the excess of duty above twenty per cent. was to be deducted after the last day of December, 1833; a second tenth after the last day of December, 1835; a third tenth after the last day of December, 1837; a fourth tenth after the last day of December, 1839; three of the remaining tenths after the last day of December, 1841; and the other three remaining tenths after the last day of June, 1842. After that day, as some sort of compensation to the domestic manufacturers of the country, the present system of credits is to be abolished, and this duty of twenty per cent. is to be paid by the importer in ready money, and that, too, according to a valuation of the articles made at the port of entry, and not at the foreign port from which they have been exported. In addition to this, the act contains a long list of articles, useful and necessary to our manufactures, which are, after June, 1842, to be admitted free of duty. It is also provided that, after that date, "duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government."

Under the operation of this act, the duties will have gradually reached the final point of depression on the 30th June, 1842, and will then stand at twenty per cent. Now, it does appear to me to be a palpable violation both of the spirit and letter of this law, to which I intend to adhere in good faith, to except the article of salt from its provisions. Salt is extensively manufactured in a portion of the State which I have in part the honor to represent. The Senator from Missouri states the foreign salt imported to be annually about six million three hundred thousand bushels; and he estimates the domestic production to be about the same quantity. Although I do not speak from data on which I can rely, I believe the quantity of domestic salt is considerably greater than the foreign importation. But be this as it may, it appears, from the Senator's own showing, that the domestic manufactured article, protected in some degree by the existing duty, exceeds six millions of bushels per annum. The domestic manufacturers of salt, however much they may have been dissatisfied with the compromise act, had at least a right to expect that this article would not be made the solitary exception and be admitted free of duty against its provisions. They had a right to rely upon the protection which this act affords; and the introduction of the present bill to make salt a free article, will take them by surprise. Is not this attempt a manifest violation of the compromise?

In the session of 1841-'42, at the latest, it will become the duty of Congress seriously to consider the subject of duties on imports generally, and adjust it in that spirit of compromise which gave birth to the Constitution itself. I hope and believe that southern gentlemen will, at that period, whilst they have a right to insist that the revenue shall be reduced to the standard of an economical administration of the Government, act in a liberal spirit towards the manufactures of the country. A duty granted merely and solely for protection, we cannot ask under the compromise; but we shall expect that, whilst imposing duties for revenue, such incidental discrimination may be made in favor of our most important and necessary manufactures as will assist American industry in struggling against foreign competition. This principle of incidental protection, within these limits, is as old as the Government; and I have never understood that it was objected to by gentlemen of the South. If I should live until that day, and be then a member of the Senate, I shall enter upon the task of adjusting the tariff with every disposition not exclusively to regard the interest of any particular portion of the Union, but to act with liberality and do justice to all the great interests involved. I know that at that time many considerations may be urged in favor of a repeal of all the duties on foreign salt. Such a measure would operate beneficially upon the great agricultural interest which I have ever regarded with peculiar favor. But, at the present moment, this duty rests upon the compromise act, and representing, as I do, a considerable salt manufacturing interest, I am not disposed now to disturb it. At the time of the general revision of the tariff the duty on this article can be considered in connection with all the rest; and then a wiser and better disposition may be made of it, than if we were now to act upon it alone, and without reference to its bearing upon the whole subject.

Mr. B. said that the question of courtesy being as it was out of view, he did not understand how Senators, who had offered able arguments against this bill, could notwithstanding conclude by declaring that they would vote for its introduction.

Mr. BENTON having made some remarks which will be found on another page—

Mr. BUCHANAN said, (in reply to Mr. BENTON,) as to the compromise act I shall say but little. Its reputed authors are here present and are very able to defend themselves. As to myself I was in a far distant land at the time of its passage, and shall never forget my own feelings when I first received information of this event.

The enemies of liberty in every country of the Old World were rejoicing in the prospect that this glorious Union—the last hope of republican institutions—was about to expire. The advocates of despotism were everywhere gloating over the prospect. It was impossible for any person placed in my situation not to see, and to feel, and to know, that this was the cherished hope of the enemies of liberal institutions throughout Europe. It was a subject of conversation in every society which I frequented in the great northern capital, where I then resided. Although I did not myself personally indulge in gloomy forebodings, yet I hailed the news of the passage of the compromise act as the harbinger of peace and tranquillity at home, with more joy than I have ever felt upon the announcement of any political event. It was then sufficient for me to know that the question which had threatened the peace of my native land was settled; and that, too, by the passage of a bill which had received the approbation of General Jackson. His sanction of it was, to me at least, the strongest evidence that it was not "a mere humbug." I felt the fullest confidence that his signature could never have been affixed to any bill which would sacrifice, or seriously injure, any of the great interests of the country.

Whether, under all the circumstances, I should have voted for this bill or not, had I then been a Senator, or whether it settled our difficulties wisely or unwisely, is not now the question. Be this as it may, it has stood the test of time during a period of six years, and it has not yet been changed by Congress in a single particular. The people of the State which I, in part, represent, have, at least, acquiesced in its provisions; and they are looking forward to the year 1841 or 1842 for a general settlement of the whole question.

Now, sir, what is my position? I am called upon to except from this compromise a single article of domestic manufacture, in which several counties of Pennsylvania are deeply interested. Would I not be faithless to my trust, if I should agree that this article, protected as it now is by the existing tariff, should be made the solitary exception; and that, too, at a moment when the manufacturers of it are reposing with perfect security on the faith of a law adhered to, as it has been by Congress, ever since its passage? It is not sufficient for me to know that we possess the unquestionable power to violate it. The true question is, would it be wise, or politic, or just, at the present advanced stage of its progress, to disregard its provisions?

And, after all, what mighty matter is to be effected by this bill? Under this very compromise, the duty on salt has already been reduced to about six cents per bushel. After the last day of the present year, it will sink still lower; and after the last day of June, 1842, it will be reduced to about two cents per bushel. Within two, or at the latest three, years after the close of the present session, there must be a general revision of the tariff; and I would ask, what interest, in the mean time, can suffer by paying the small duty of six, and afterwards of four or two cents per bushel on the importation of foreign salt? Is this a cause sufficient to justify the mighty efforts which have been made to repeal the duty? When I observed these efforts of the Senator's great mind to accomplish an object so trifling and inconsiderable, they forcibly reminded me of the simile of the English poet. They resemble

"Ocean into tempest tost,

To waft a feather, or to drown a fly."

Let us wait for two or three years, and then settle this little matter in conjunction with the great questions which must then arise. It is not an object which could excuse, much less justify a departure from the compromise.

THE SALT DUTY.

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN C. CALHOUN, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN SENATE, January 30, 1839.

On Mr. BENTON's motion for leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the Salt duty and the Fishing bounties.
